ger. He therefore fortified two camps, the greater on the weſt ſide of the river, and the leſſer on the eaſt, and opened a communication between them by a bridge. And now there was no longer the leaſt harmony between the conſuls; they had quite different maxims and purſued oppoſite meaſures, each ſucceeding day deſtroying the projects of the preceding. Hannibal, perceiving that the Romans could not long avoid a general action, having harangued his troops, drew them up in battalia, and bid the enemy defiance. It was Æmilius's day to command; and he, knowing that Hannibal would be ſoon obliged to decamp for want of proviſions, deſpiſed his bravadoes, and kept cloſe in his intrenchments; but the next morning, by break of day, Terentius, whoſe turn it was to command, marched his troops into the great plain, where the little camp was pitched, and drew them up after the uſual manner, the haſtati in the firſt line, the principes in the ſecond, and the triarii in the third. The cavalry were poſted on the wings. In the right the Roman knights flanked the legionaries; in the left the cavalry of the allies covered their own infantry. The two conſuls commanded the two wings, Æmilius the right, and Terentius the left; and the two proconſuls, Servilius and Attilius, the main body. On the other hand, Hannibal, whoſe army conſiſted of forty thouſand foot and ten thouſand horſe, placed his Gauliſh and Spaniſh cavalry in his left wing, to face the Roman knights, and the Numidian horſe in his right, over-againſt the cavalry of the allies of Rome. As to his infantry, he divided the African battalions into two bodies, one of which he poſted near the Gauliſh and Spaniſh horſe, the other near the Numidian. Between theſe two bodies were placed, on one ſide the Gauliſh, on the other the Spaniſh, infantry, drawn up in ſuch a manner, as to form kind of obtuſe angle, projecting a conſiderable way beyond the two wings. Behind this firſt line he drew up a ſecond, which had no projection. Aſdrubal commanded the left wing, Maherbal the right, and Hannibal himſelf, with his brother Mago, the main body. The onſet was begun with the light-armed infantry, the Romans diſcharging their javelins, and the Baleares their ſtones, with equal ſucceſs; nevertheleſs the conſul Æmilius was wounded. Then the Roman cavalry in the right wing advanced againſt the Gauliſh and Spaniſh in Hannibal's left wing. As they were ſhut in by the river on one ſide, and their infantry

The two Roman conſuls diſagree.

The diſpoſition of the two armies at the battle of Cannæ.

on

on the other, they did not fight, as uſual, by charging and wheeling off, and then returning to the charge, but continued fighting each man againſt his adverſary, till one of them was killed or retired. After they had made inconceivable efforts on both ſides to overbear each other, they all on a ſudden diſmounted, and fought on foot man to man with incredible fury. But this attack was more bloody than long; the Gauls and Spaniards prevailed, put the Romans to the rout, and purſuing them along the river, ſtrewed the ground with their dead bodies, Aſdrubal giving no quarter. This action was ſcarce over, when the infantry advanced on both ſides. The Romans fell firſt upon the Spaniards and Gauls, who, as we have obſerved above, formed a kind of triangle, projecting beyond the two wings. Theſe gave ground, and, purſuant to Hannibal's directions, ſunk into the void ſpace in their rear; by which means they inſenſibly brought the Romans, who followed them with more ardor than caution, into the centre of the African infantry, and then rallying, attacked them in front, while the Africans charged them on both their flanks. The Romans being, by this artful retreat, drawn into the ſnare and ſurrounded, no longer kept their ranks, but formed ſeveral platoons, in order to face every way. Æmilius, who was in the right wing, ſeeing the danger of the main body, at the head of the legionaries, who were his only hopes, after the defeat of the cavalry, acted the part both of a ſoldier and general, penetrating into the very heart of the enemy's battalions, and cutting in pieces all who oppoſed him. All the Roman cavalry that was left attended the brave conſul on foot, and encouraged by his example, fought like men in deſpair. But, in the mean time, Aſdrubal at the head of a detachment of Gauliſh and Spaniſh infantry brought from the centre, attacked Æmilius's legionaries, who were greatly fatigued, with ſuch fury, that they were forced to give ground and fly. Æmilius, covered with wounds and blood, was too weak to reach the camp; and therefore, being deſerted by his men, ſat down on a ſtone, and in that condition was found by one Lentulus, a tribune, who was flying as well as the reſt. Lentulus, knowing the conſul, immediately diſmounted, and offered him his horſe; but Æmilius replied with a faint voice, I have lived long enough, dear Lentulus; fly, and let me die. Take care to give the ſenate timely notice of our misfortunes, that they may guard and fortify Rome, and tell tell Fabius, that I have followed the advice he gave me at our parting to the very laſt. Then Lentulus paſſed on, and the enemy's cavalry, who purſued the Romans, coming up, killed the conſul without knowing him (M). Thus fell one of the braveſt conſuls, and beſt citizens, Rome ever had [n].

The Roman horſe defeated.

The conſul Æmilius Paulus killed.

In the main body, the Romans, though inveſted on all ſides, continued to ſell their lives dear, fighting in platoons, and making a great ſlaughter of the enemy. But, being at length overpowered, and diſheartened by the loſs of the two proconſuls, Servilius and Attilius, who headed them, they diſperſed and fled, ſome to the right, and ſome to the left, as the ground or the enemy gave them an opportunity. But the Numidian horſe, more fit for a purſuit than a pitched battle, cut moſt of them in pieces. The whole plain was covered with heaps of dead bodies; inſomuch, that Hannibal himſelf, thinking the butchery too terrible, ordered his men to put a ſtop to it. As for Terentius Varro, the author of all theſe misfortunes, after the Numidians had put the wing he commanded into confuſion, he, without attempting to rally his men, fled to Venuſia with only ſeventy horſe. In this bloody action at leaſt forty-five thouſand Romans were left dead upon the ſpot (N); among whom were one conſul, two proconſuls, two military

And the Roman army defeated with great ſlaughter.

[n] Polyb. l. iii. c. 115, 116. Liv. l. xxi. c. 48, 49.

(M) The account Plutarch gives us of the conſul Æmilius Paulus's death, is ſomewhat different from this. This great man, ſays he, after he had diſcharged all the duties of a good citizen and able commander, was thrown by his horſe, which probably had been wounded. Hereupon the knights round him diſmounted to defend him; which the reſt of the cavalry obſerving, believed that they had diſmounted by the general's order, and did the ſame. In the mean time, Æmilius, having received many wounds, and loſt a great quantity of blood, reſted ſome time on a ſtone; and then threw himſelf into the middle of the enemy's ſquadrons, who diſpatched him with innumerable wounds.

(N) There is a great diſagreement among authors as to the number of Romans killed and taken in the battle of Cannæ. According to Livy, the republic loſt on that occaſion fifty thouſand men, the auxiliaries included. According to Polybius, of ſix thouſand Roman horſe only ſeventy eſcaped to Venuſia with Terentius Varro, and three hundred of the auxiliary horſe. As to the infantry, that writer tells us, that ſeventy thouſand of the Roman military quæſtors, twenty-nine legionary tribunes, and fourſcore ſenators or magiſtrates who had a right of voting in the ſenate, and had ſerved as voluntiers. Among the reſt, the famous Minucius was killed, who had been general of the horſe the laſt year under Fabius. About ſeventeen thouſand of the right wing had fled to the two camps, ten thouſand to the great camp, and ſeven thouſand to the little one. The former, having loſt their officers, and expecting to be inveſted the next day, invited the latter to join them, that they might march away together in the night, and take refuge in Canuſium, a ſtrong city not far off. But it was with the utmoſt difficulty that Sempronius Tuditanus, a legionary tribune, could prevail upon any of thoſe in the little camp to hearken to his propoſal, they being all afraid, leſt the enemy ſhould intercept them in paſſing from one camp to the other. However, the braveſt of them drew themſelves up at length into a cuneus, that is, in the form of a wedge, marched out in good order, and arrived ſafe at the great camp; where they joined their fellow-ſoldiers, marched away before day-break, and got to Canuſium.

In the Carthaginian camp, the night was ſpent in feaſtings and rejoicings. Hannibal had never gained a more complete or more ſeaſonable victory. As ſoon as the day returned, he beheld with infinite ſatisfaction the whole plain covered with Romans, who had been ſlain in the action, while, in ſurveying the field of battle, he found that his loſs amounted to no more than four thouſand Gauls, fifteen hundred Africans and Spaniards, and about two hundred horſe. Hannibal took, what in the action and what in the purſuit, ten thouſand priſoners. Such a number of knights are ſaid to have been found dead on the field, that three buſhels of their rings were ſent to Carthage. Immediately Roman foot died on the field of battle, fighting like brave men, and that thirteen thouſand were taken priſoners. According to Dionyſius of Halicarnaſſus, of ſix thouſand horſe only three hundred and ſeventy eſcaped the general ſlaughter, and of eighty thouſand foot, three thouſand only. If we give credit to a tradition, which continued in Plutarch's time, fifty thouſand Romans were killed on the ſpot, and four thouſand made priſoners, exclusive of the ten thouſand who were, according to him, taken in the two camps the day after the battle. Livy ſays that eight thouſand of the beſt Carthaginian troops were killed in the action.

mediately after the victory, Maherbal preſſed Hannibal to march ſtrait to Rome and beſiege that capital; which he refuſing to do, Maherbal took the liberty to tell him, that he knew how to conquer, but knew not how to uſe and improve his victories. Many of the antients have thought as Maherbal did, and have reproached the Carthaginian general with the ſame fault; but whether juſtly or not, may be well queſtioned. The advantages he had gained were chiefly owing to his cavalry, who could be of no uſe in a ſiege. The Roman infantry were no-ways inferior to his, and would be invincible, when ſheltered by walls and ramparts. The inhabitants of ſo populous a city were all bred up to arms from their infancy, obliged to ſerve as ſoon as they attained to the age of manhood, and would uſe their utmoſt efforts in defence of their wives, their children, and their domeſtic gods. They had as many generals as ſenators, moſt of them men of great prudence and conduct; whereas the advantages hitherto gained over them were owing to the raſhneſs of ſome preſumptuous and unexperienced generals, who had been placed at the head of their armies by the favour of the people, contrary to the intereſt of the public. Beſides, no one nation or city of Italy had yet declared for him; and he might judge it neceſſary, and not without reaſon, to gain over or conquer ſome of them before he attempted the ſiege of Rome. Hannibal having, probably on theſe conſiderations, determined not to follow the advice of Maherbal, continued ſome days on the field of battle, allowing his ſoldiers to ſtrip the dead, and gather up the booty, which the Romans had left on the plain. On this occaſion the Carthaginians, among other moving objects, found, to their great ſurpriſe, a Numidian yet alive, lying under the dead body of a Roman, who had thrown himſelf headlong on his enemy and beat him down; but being no longer able to make uſe of his weapons, becauſe he had loſt his hands, had tore off the noſe and ears of the Numidian with his teeth, and in that fit of rage expired. The Carthaginians, having ſpent a whole day in ſtripping the dead bodies of the unhappy Romans, the victorious general inveſted the two camps in the evening, which he eaſily made himſelf maſter of, there being none in them but wounded men or cowards, who had not had courage enough to retire with their companions to Canuſium. They all ſurrendered upon terms, and were allowed to march out with their cloaths, but without arms. The Romans were to pay three hundred denarii a head for their their ranſom, that is, 91. 7 s. 9 d. their allies two hundred, and each ſlave one hundred. Till this was done, Hannibal divided them into ſeveral companies, and kept them priſoners under different guards. They amounted in all to four thouſand men, the reſt having retired, as we have related above, to Canuſium [o].

The two Roman camps taken.

AMONG thoſe Romans, who had fled to Canuſium, were four legionary tribunes; and of theſe the ſoldiers choſe two to be their chief commanders, viz. Appius Claudius Pulcher and young Scipio, the ſon of the proconſul in Spain, who was at this time but eighteen years of age. While Scipio was deliberating with his collegue what meaſures to take, notice was given him, that the young nobility among the troops were aſſembled in a houſe, and contriving how to leave Italy, a[1] retire to ſome of thoſe kings who were friends to Rome, which they gave up for loſt. Hereupon the young tribune, filled with zeal, took with him a band of ſoldiers, ſurpriſed the cowards, and with his ſword drawn came up to Cæcilius Metellus, the author of this pernicious deſign, whom he addreſſed thus; I call the great Jupiter to witneſs, that I will never depart my country; nor will I ſuffer any man to do it. This I ſolemnly ſwear; and do you, Cæcilius, either take the ſame oath, or die. The fear of preſent death made them all take the ſame oath; and then Scipio ſecured them with a ſtrong guard. Thus this young Roman, whom we ſhall afterwards ſee honoured with the glorious ſurname of Africanus, ſignalized his zeal for the public welfare on his firſt entering upon public life. The conſul Terentius, ſince his coming to Venuſia, whither he had fled with only ſeventy men, had been joined by five thouſand of the fugitives. With theſe he went to Canuſium, as ſoon as he heard that there were ſix thouſand more in that place, and joined his troops to them; ſo that the whole had now the appearance of a conſular army.

IN the mean time it was reported at Rome, that both conſuls were killed, and that of eighty-ſeven thouſand men there was ſcarce one left alive. Never was the city filled with more terror, nor a more univerſal conſternation ſeen there. All the Roman conſtancy was neceſſary to prevent the fatal conſequences of ſo ſhocking an affliction. For want of conſuls, the two prætors aſſembled the ſenators, who could hardly give their opinions, being every moment interrupted interrupted by the cries of the people, and the ſhrieks of the women, who lamented the loſs of their huſbands, children or fathers. As the conduct of Fabius was now fully juſtified by the defeat of Terentius, his counſel was liſtened to and followed. He adviſed them to ſend to the Appian and Latin ways horſemen well mounted, to learn from the fugitives the ſtate of affairs; what was become of the conſuls? to what place the remains of the army had retired? where Hannibal was encamped? what he was doing? and what he deſigned to do? That the women ſhould by a decree be forbid to appear in public, and diſturb the city with their outcries and lamentations; that when any courier arrived, he ſhould be brought, privately and without noiſe, to the prætors; and that no perſon ſhould be ſuffered to go out of the city, leſt it ſhould be deſerted. This advice was applauded; the crouds that filled the ſtreets were diſperſed; and each ſenator undertook to keep every thing quiet in his own neighbourhood. Such was the ſituation of affairs, when at length a courier arrived from Terentius with letters, importing, that the Roman army had been defeated; that Æmilius was ſlain; that he himſelf was retired to Canuſium, where he was aſſembling the remains of the troops; that about ten thouſand men of different corps had joined him, but moſt of them without officers; that Hannibal was ſtill encamped at Cannæ, and buſy there in fixing the ranſoms of the priſoners he had taken. At the ſame time a veſſel arrived from Sicily, with letters from the prætor Otacilius, acquainting the ſenate, that a Carthaginian ſquadron was ravaging the coaſt of Syracuſe, and waiting for an opportunity to make a deſcent. The conſcript fathers, in the midſt of theſe perplexities, behaved with incredible conſtancy; and aſſembling daily made the neceſſary preparations for the defence both of Italy and Sicily. Marcellus, an hero already honoured with an extraordinary triumph for having defeated the Gauls and killed their king in a ſingle combat, had been appointed prætor of Sicily, and was now equipping a fleet at Oſtia. But the ſenate ordered him from thence into Apulia, to take upon him the command of the army at Canuſium in the room of Varro, who was recalled. Marcellus, purſuant to his orders, ſet out immediately for Rome, and from thence for Canuſium, where he found a body of about fourteen thouſand men. Upon his arrival Varro left Canuſium and returned to Rome. It is almoſt incredible, that the author of ſo many both public and private calamities ſhould be received with reſpect

[o] Liv. ibid. c. 51.

Meaſures taken at Rome after the defeat at Cannæ.

Marcellus appointed to command the army.

Varro is well received at Rome.

reſpect either by the ſenate or people. Nevertheleſs, all the antients tell us, that he met with as kind a reception from all orders of men in the ſtate, as if he had gained a ſignal victory. All the ſenators in a body, attended with crouds of people, went out to meet him, and thank him for not having deſpaired of the republic [p]. Valerius Maximus tells us, that the ſenate and people offered him the dictatorſhip, which he refuſed, and by his modeſt refuſal wiped off, in ſome meaſure, the ſhame of his former behaviour [q]. Thus the Romans, by treating their unfortunate commanders with humanity, leſſened the diſgrace of their being vanquiſhed or diſcharged, while the Carthaginians condemned their generals to cruel deaths upon their being overcome, often without their fault, by the enemy.

M. Junius Pera dictator.

As the preſen ſituation of affairs required an abſolute magiſtrate, the ſenators of their own authority, appointed M. Junius Pera, who had bore the offices of prætor, cenſor, and conſul, to be dictator; and he choſe Tib. Sempronius Gracchus for his general of the horſe. Junius made it his whole buſineſs to put the army in a condition to make head againſt the victorious enemy. All the young Romans above ſeventeen years of age, of what rank ſoever, were obliged to inliſt themſelves; as were alſo thoſe who had already ſerved their legal time. By this means four legions and ten thouſand horſe were ſoon raiſed in the city. The allies of Rome, the colonies, and the municipia, furniſhed their contingents as uſual. To theſe were added out of the great number of ſlaves in Rome eight thouſand of the youngeſt and ſtrongeſt. The republic purchaſed them of their maſters, but did not oblige them to ſerve without their own conſent, which they gave, when aſked, by anſwering, Volo, I am willing; whence they were called Volones, to diſtinguiſh them from the other corps, by a name leſs odious than that of ſlaves. As the Romans, after the loſs of ſo many battles, had no ſwords, darts, or bucklers left in their magazines, the Volones were ſupplied with the arms which had been formerly taken from the enemy, and hung up in the public porticos and temples. The finances of Rome were not leſs exhauſted; but this defect was ſupplied by the liberality of her citizens. The ſenators ſhewing the example, were followed firſt by the knights, and afterwards by all the tribes, who, ſtripping themſelves of all the gold they had, brought it to the public treaſury. The [p] Plut. in Fab. Liv. l. xxii. c. 57. [q] Val. Max. l. iii. c. 6.

Slaves inliſted in the Roman troops.

The ſenators only reſerved their rings and the bullæ about their children's necks. As for the ſilver coin, it was now the firſt time alloyed with copper, and the value of it raiſed. Thus the finances were again put into a good condition, and a competent army raiſed [r].

In the mean time Hannibal, wanting money, gave the Roman priſoners leave to redeem themſelves. The ranſom of each horſeman he fixed at five hundred denarii, that is, 16l. 2s. 11d. that of each foot ſoldier at three hundred, and of each ſlave at one hundred. As for the allies of Rome, notwithſtanding his want of money, he diſmiſſed them, agreeable to his former practice, without ranſom. The Roman captives agreed to ſend ten of their body to negotiate their redemption at Rome; and Hannibal required no other ſecurity for their return, but their oath. Carthalo was ſent at the head of them to make propoſals of peace to the republic, which Hannibal imagined ſhe would be glad to purchaſe at any rate. But upon the firſt report of Carthalo's arrival to treat of a peace, the dictator ſent a lictor to him, commanding him forthwith to quit the Roman territory. As for the ten deputies, the ſenate, conſidering them as foreigners ſince their captivity, did not ſuffer them to enter the city, but met without the walls to hear what they had to offer, in behalf of themſelves and their fellow-captives. After a warm debate, which laſted many hours, it was abſolutely concluded againſt the redemption of thoſe unhappy men, who, it was pretended, had acted the parts of cowards, in not retiring with their fellow-ſoldiers to Canuſium (O). The priſoners being thus left to the mercy of the

The Romans refuſe to redeem their captives.

[r] Liv. ibid. c. 57, 58. Plut. in Fab. Flor. l. ii.

(O) More preſſing reaſons, than the pretended cowardice of the captives, prevailed on the ſenate to conclude againſt their redemption. They were afraid of enriching Hannibal with the ranſom-money, and at the ſame time willing to let him know, that Rome was not ſo deſtitute of men, but ſhe could ſpare ſeveral thouſands. Beſides, by this ſignal puniſhment Rome taught her ſoldiers this great leſſon, that in ſuch conjunctures they muſt either conquer, die, or live in perpetual ſlavery, which to a Roman was worſe than death itſelf. One of the ten deputies mixed with the croud and diſappeared. But Rome would not ſuffer the perjured wretch to reap the fruit of his iniquity. She ordered him to be taken out of his houſe, and ſent back to Hannibal's camp. The republic was fond of purchaſing the reputation of being juſt, when it coſt little, and the ſtate did not ſuffer by it.

the Carthaginian, he ſent the moſt conſiderable among them to Carthage, and of the reſt made gladiators, obliging them to fight with one another, even relations with relations, for the entertainment of his troops [s].

At length Hannibal left Cannæ, and took his rout towards Compſa, a city of the Hirpini, near the head of the Aufidus, which ſurrendered to him, and was the firſt that fell off from the Romans. From thence he turned towards Capua, the inhabitants of which city, thinking the time now come to ſhake off the Roman yoke and recover their antient liberty, ſent deputies to treat with Hannibal, who promiſed them an entire liberty and independence, and beſides agreed to put into their hands four hundred Roman knights, to be exchanged with the ſame number of Capuan youths in the ſervice of Rome. Upon theſe conditions the Capuans ſurrendered their city to Hannibal. As to the Roman garriſon, the people contrived to ſhut them up in the public baths and ſuffocate them there. When Hannibal made his entry, all the town crouded to met him, except Decius Magius, a friend of the Romans, and a ſmall number of the nobility, among whom was one Perola, the ſon of Pacuvius, who had been the chief author of the revolt. Perola was afterwards obliged by his father to go and pay his homage to Hannibal; but, as he had imbibed the ſentiments of Magius, he afterwards formed a deſign to ſtab the Carthaginian general at a magnificent entertainment, which his father was to give him. But Pacuvius, to whom he imparted his intention, in hopes of gaining his conſent, diſſuaded him from it; and Hannibal eſcaped this danger. The next day the ſenate of Capua being aſſembled, Hannibal complained to them of the diſaffection of Magius, who was thereupon delivered up to him loaded with irons, and by his orders put on board a ſhip bound for Carthage. But the veſſel being driven by a ſtorm into the port of Cyrene, a city belonging to the king of Egypt, the illuſtrious priſoner ran and embraced the ſtatue of Ptolemy Philopator; and the Carthaginians not daring to drag him from that ſanctuary, he appealed to the king, and was conducted to Alexandria, where Ptolemy received him with great humanity, and gave him leave to return either to Capua, or to Rome; but he choſe to continue at Alexandria under the protection of his deliverer.

Capua ſubmits to Hannibal.

And

[s] Liv. ibid. [t] Plut. in Hannibal. Liv. l. xxii. c. 9, 10.

AND now Hannibal diſpatched his brother Mago to give an account at Carthage of his ſucceſs. As ſoon as he arrived there, he acquainted the ſenate, that Hannibal in ſix pitched battles had killed two hundred thouſand Romans, and taken fifty thouſand priſoners; and that the Apulians, Brutians, Lucanians, and Campanians, had ſubmitted to the Carthaginian dominion. So much good fortune ſeemed incredible, and Mago was not believed, till he gave a glaring proof of it, by ſpreading abroad in the ſenate-houſe, ſome ſay, one buſhel, others, three buſhels, of rings, taken from the Roman knights and ſenators (P). Having thus prepoſſeſſed the ſenate in favour of his brother, he proceeded to ſolicit ſuccours for him, that he might be enabled to carry on ſo ſucceſsful a war. The requeſt was approved of, and the Barcan faction triumphed. Himilco, the head of it, turning to Hanno, as it were to inſult him, Well, ſaid he, has the war turned to the diſadvantage of our country? Muſt we deliver up Hannibal to the Romans?

Mago gives an account of Hannibal's victories to the ſenate of Carthage.

(P) Authors are divided about the prodigious quantity of gold rings. Pliny ſeems to inſinuate, that Hanno carried with him to Carthage three buſhels of rings. To make the thing the more credible, he tells us, that in the time of the ſecond Punic war, all the citizens of Rome, without exception, aſſumed the right of wearing a gold ring (28). Florus ſays, that Hannibal ſent to Carthage two buſhels of gold rings, and that by them the ſenate judged of the number of Roman knights, who had loſt their lives in the ſeveral battles Hannibal had gained (29). The moſt probable opinion, according to Livy, is, that one buſhel of rings was ſent to Carthage. The ſame author adds, that Hanno, to ſhew how great the loſs of the Romans was, acquainted the ſenate of Carthage, that at Rome only knights, and the moſt conſiderable among the citizens, had the privilege of wearing gold rings. If all, without diſtinction, had enjoyed this privilege, as Pliny inſinuates, Hannibal might well have ſent three buſhels of rings to Carthage after the many victories he had already gained. But the opinion moſt agreeable to the teſtimony of the antients is, that only knights and patricians at this time were allowed to wear rings. Florus tells us, that Hannibal, to ſhew how many Romans had fallen in the battle, made a bridge with their dead bodies for his troops over the river Vergellus. What Florus ſays is confirmed by Valerius Maximus; but Polybius, Plutarch, and Livy, make no mention either of the river Vergellus, or of this new kind of bridge.

(28) Plin. l. xxxiii. c. 1. (29) Flor. l. ii. c. 16.

mans? Hanno, though thus provoked, anſwered with moderation: The war, ſaid he, is ſucceſsfully begun, I grant it; but I ſhall not be eaſy, till an end is put to it by an happy peace. Send me troops and proviſions, ſays Hannibal. Is this the language of a conqueror, who is maſter of ſo many nations in Italy? The Roman republic, we are told, is reduced to the laſt extremity. Do the vanquiſhed ſhew any ſigns of deſpair? Tell me, Mago, Do they make any advances towards a peace? Do they ſeem to deſire it? Mago anſwered, that the Romans indeed, notwithſtanding their loſſes, ſtrove to put a good face upon their affairs, however deſperate. I conclude then, reſumed Hanno briſkly, that we are ſcarce any farther advanced, than we were the day Hannibal entered Italy. We have indeed done enough to obtain an advantageous peace with Rome; and that ought to be our utmoſt view. One ſingle defeat may undo all our mighty projects. I therefore vote againſt ſending any ſuccours to the army in Italy. If Hannibal has really gained all theſe victories, he needs no ſupplies; if he ſends us falſe accounts, he deſerves none. But notwithſtanding Hanno's ſpeech, an immediate ſupply of four thouſand Numidians, forty elephants, and a thouſand talents of ſilver, were by a plurality of voices decreed for the army in Italy. Nor was this all; a commiſſioner was ſent with Mago into Spain with powers to raiſe levies there, which were to be equally divided between the Carthaginian armies in Spain and Italy. Aſdrubal, who had juſt obtained a ſignal victory over the revolted Spaniards, and ſubdued the country of the Carpetani, was ordered to leave Spain, and march with his army to the aſſiſtance of his brother in Italy. In his room Himilco was ſent into Spain with a competent army, and a ſufficient number of galleys to keep the ſeas. But, in the mean time, the two Scipios, hearing that Aſdrubal was advancing towards the Iberus in his way to the Pyrenees, and knowing of what dangerous conſequence it would be for Rome, that Hannibal ſhould receive ſo ſtrong a reinforcement, reſolved to oppoſe his paſſing that river. With this view they paſſed the Iberus, and having brought Aſdrubal to a general engagement, gained a complete victory, which prevented the Carthaginian for ſome years from going into Italy. Thus the two Scipios by their victories and prudent conduct in Spain made Rome amends for the loſſes ſhe ſuſtained in Italy.

Hanno's ſpeech in the ſenate.

Aſdrubal defeated in Spain by the Scipios.

THE dictator Junius and the ſenate, encouraged by the news they received from Spain, carried on their preparations parations for the next campaign with great expedition, while Hannibal was loſing his time at Capua, being captivated with the bewitching pleaſures of that place. The dictator releaſed from priſon all criminals and perſons confined for debt, who were willing to enliſt themſelves. Of theſe he formed a body of ſix thouſand foot, armed with the broad ſwords and bucklers which had been formerly taken from the Gauls. Then the Roman army, to the number of about twenty-five thouſand men, partly citizens, partly ſlaves, and partly criminals, marched out of Rome under the command of the dictator. The remains of Varro's army, about fifteen thouſand men, were kept by Marcellus at Caſilinum in a readineſs to march, whenever there ſhould be occaſion. At length Hannibal began to move from Capua, in order to ſubdue the reſt of Campania. He made a fruitleſs attempt upon Neapolis, and then turned towards Nola. But the inhabitants of that city were kept ſteady by the preſence of Marcellus, who, leaving Caſilinum, paſſed the Vulturnus, croſſed the mountains of Sueſſula with incredible expedition, and unexpectedly appeared before Nola. Then the Carthaginian, after having made another unſucceſsful attempt upon Neapolis, fell upon Nuceria, which, for want of proviſions, was obliged to capitulate. From Nuceria he returned to Nola, with a deſign to beſiege it, Marcellus having ſhut himſelf up with all his troops. The inhabitants were greatly inclined to favour Hannibal, and their affection for the Carthaginian was kept up by a young man, of known valour and great intereſt among the people, by name Bantius. He had ſerved in the Roman armies with credit, and ſignalized himſelf at the battle of Cannæ, fighting near Æmilius, till being covered with wounds, he dropt down on the field of battle, where he was found the next day and brought to Hannibal. As none of his wounds proved mortal, Hannibal, underſtanding that he was a native of Nola, took great care of him, and, when he was cured of his wounds, ſent him home without ranſom. This friendly behaviour had its due effect on the mind of the generous Bantius. He returned to Nola wholly in the Carthaginian intereſt, and gained over many of the chief citizens to his party. Marcellus could have eaſily deſtroyed him, but he choſe rather to gain him. One day, when he came to wait on Marcellus, the Roman, pretending not to know him, aſked him his name. My name, replied the young warrior with a great deal of modeſty, is Bantius; What, are you the Criminals and priſoners for debt inliſted at Rome.

Hannibal takes Nuceria.

famous Bantius, anſwered the general, ſo much celebrated at Rome? I have often heard of you. It was not your fault that a Roman conſul fell into the enemy's hands. How much blood did you loſe in endeavouring to ſave his life! What pleaſure is it to me, to ſee and embrace a brave man, who does honour to his country, and may be a means of ſaving Rome! Then Marcellus to tender embraces added preſents, and in ſhort rekindled in his heart his former love to Rome. The recovery of this ſingle man brought many Nolans over to Marcellus, who was informed by them of all the ſecrets of the Carthaginian party. This was the ſituation of affairs at Nola, when Hannibal appeared before it, not doubting but he ſhould ſoon become maſter of the place, in which he had all the populace and moſt of the nobility on his ſide. But Marcellus, having by ſound of trumpet forbid any of the citizens to approach the ramparts, or even come out of their houſes on pain of death, drew up his men within the walls, and ſallying out at three ſeveral gates, fell unexpectedly upon Hannibal, killed five thouſand of his men, and obliged the reſt to retire in great confuſion. In this action, which revived the courage of the Romans, by ſhewing them that Hannibal was not invincible, the number of the killed on the ſide of the Romans amounted only to five hundred [u]. Some antient writers quoted by Livy [w], tell us, that the number of the dead on the ſide of the Carthaginians amounted to no more than two thouſand three hundred; but add, that the Romans loſt only one man in the action. This check was a ſenſible mortification to Hannibal, who thereupon left Nola, and marched to Acerræ, a ſmall city in that neighbourhood. But the Acerrani upon his approach with one conſent abandoned their houſes, and retired with their moſt valuable effects to thoſe cities in Campania, which continued faithful to the Romans. The Carthaginian having made himſelf maſter of the empty city of Acerra, in order to recover his reputation, undertook the ſiege of Caſilinum, a ſtrong city on the banks of the Vulturnus, thinking it garriſoned by Campanians. But it happened, that a body of Prænestines having found the inhabitants, as they paſſed through their city, wavering in their fidelity to Rome, had cut their throats in the night, and poſſeſſed themſelves of the walls. Theſe had been afterwards reinforced by about four hundred Peruſians from Hetruria, and a ſmall

Marcellus gains an advantage over Hannibal before Nola.

[u] Plut. in Marcel. [w] Liv. l. xxiii. c. 16.

ſmall number of Latins and Romans. As they were all men of bravery and reſolution, they made ſuch a vigorous defence, that Hannibal was obliged, after ſeveral fruitleſs attempts, to turn the ſiege into a blockade [x]. Having therefore left part of his troops in the camp, as winter now approached, he quartered the reſt in the villages and open places of Campania, while he himſelf took up his reſidence in the voluptuous city of Capua, where he got a thorough reliſh for pleaſure, which brought him down to a level with the reſt of mankind. The leſs he had been uſed to an effeminate life, the more he now indulged himſelf in it, ſpending moſt part of his time in feaſting and revelling with the Capuan women. He was more frequently ſeen, ſays Valerius Maximus [y], among the young debauchees in a public place called Seplaſia, than in his camp before Caſilinum. Seplaſia was a public place in Capua, whither all the debauchees reſorted; and therefore ſo infamous, that it was deemed a crime in a Roman barely to appear there [z]. Thus Capua proved more fatal to Hannibal, than Cannæ to the Romans. All the antients reproach him more for the life he led at Capua, than for his having neglected to beſiege Rome after the battle of Cannæ. The example of the general infected the ſoldiery; inſomuch, that when he led them again in the ſpring to the ſiege of Caſilinum, he found them quite altered, and as impatient of military toils as raw levies. They were followed by troops of diſſolute women, and thinking it hard to live in tents, they deſerted in crouds, and returned to Capua and the other places in Campania, where they had ſpent the winter ſo much to their ſatisfaction. Hannibal, inſtead of attempting to ſtorm the beſieged town, endeavoured to reduce it by famine; and indeed the garriſon was brought to the utmoſt extremity for want of proviſions. Two Roman armies were within reach of the place; but neither in a condition to relieve it. The dictator Junius was ſoon recalled to Rome to conſult new auſpices, and had forbid, before his departure, Sempronius his general of the horſe, to undertake any thing during his abſence. The brave Marcellus was willing to relieve the beſieged at all events; but the inhabitants of Nola would not ſuffer him to leave them, imagining, that the blockade of Caſilinum was only a feint, and that Hannibal's real aim was at their city. In the mean time, the garrison of Casilinum, being almost starved to death, were scarce able to carry their arms. Many of them, to avoid perishing with hunger or falling into Hannibal's hands, put an end to their unhappy lives. Sempronius, greatly affected with the distress of these brave men, endeavoured to relieve them, by throwing first barrels of meal, and afterwards nuts into the Vulturnus, which ran through the town. But this artifice being discovered, and all methods of supplying the city entirely stopped, Hannibal summoned the garrison to surrender. But those brave men preferring death to slavery, would not hearken to his summons, their hunger, in the mean time, not suffering them to spare any animals whatsoever; not even rats. Nay, at length they pulled off the skins of their bucklers, softened them in the water, and lived upon them with great frugality. Lastly, to give the enemy a proof of their constancy and resolution, they ploughed up the ground near their houses and sowed it with pulse. When Hannibal heard this, he cried out, What then, do the besieged design to keep me here till their seed is come to maturity? From that time he shewed himself inclined to consent to a capitulation, which was soon agreed to by both parties, on this condition, that the freedmen should be allowed to march out of the town upon their paying seven ounces of gold a head. Thus Hannibal made himself master of Casilinum after a long blockade, during which the Prænestines and Perusians gave proofs of a constancy scarce to be matched by the Romans themselves. The inhabitants of Petilia, a city in the country of the Brutians, which Hannibal besieged next, gave him as much trouble as the garrison of Casilinum; but was taken at last, the Romans not being in a condition to send them succours.

Hannibal enervates himſelf at Capua.

[x] Liv. ibid. c. 18. [y] Val. Max. l. ix. c. 1. [z] Vide Cic. in Piſonem.

The brave defence of the garrison of Casilinum.

The vacant places in the Roman senate filled up

In the mean time, as the best part of the Roman nobility had lost their lives in the war, the conscript fathers began to think of filling up the vacant places in the senate; and because there were then no censors, they ordered Terentius Varro to nominate some person, who had been formerly censor, to be a second dictator, whose office should be wholly confined to this province. Terentius named M. Fabius Buteo, the oldest of the former censors; but did not allow him a general of the horse. Fabius discharged his office with great prudence; for he first chose to the Patrician dignity all those, who since the last cen-

sors

ſors had obtained curule magiſtracies ; then thoſe without exception who had been tribunes of the people, plebeian ædiles, or quæſtors ; and laſtly, ſuch as had diſtinguiſhed themſelves in the army, or obtained any military rewards from their generals. Thus an hundred and ſeventy-ſeven new ſenators were created without jealouſy, complaints, or contention ; and the dictator had no ſooner read the liſt to the people, than he abdicated his dignity, highly applauded by all ranks of men [a].

The ſenate being thus filled up, the next buſineſs was to chuſe conſuls for the enſuing year. Sempronius Gracchus, general of the horſe to the dictator Junius, and Poſthumius Albinus, who commanded a body of troops in Ciſalpine Gaul, were raiſed to the conſulate. After the election of the conſuls, the prætors and other great officers of the ſtate were appointed ; but in all theſe promotions Marcellus, notwithſtanding the glory he had lately acquired, was entirely forgot, through the jealouſy, as ſome writers conjecture, of the dictator Junius, who preſided at the election of the new magiſtrates. The elections being over the dictator returned to his camp ; but the conſul Sempronius continued in Rome, to conſult with the Senate about the operations of the approaching campaign. But, in the mean time, news was brought to Rome, that Poſthumius Albinus, who was juſt raiſed to the conſulate a third time, had been cut off with all his army by the Boii in a vaſt foreſt, called by the Gauls the foreſt of Litana, which he had been obliged to croſs. Hereupon the conſul Sempronius having aſſembled the ſenate, endeavoured to raiſe their dejected ſpirits, adviſing them among other things to withdraw all their forces out of Gaul and other countries, and turn them againſt Hannibal, the only ſource of all their evils. If we can once drive Hannibal out of Italy, ſaid he, the rebellious nations will be ſoon reduced again. This advice was followed, and all the troops of the republic ordered into the provinces near Hannibal. The army, which the dictator Junius had commanded, was given to the conſul Sempronius. Marcellus's army, which conſiſted of thoſe who had eſcaped the general ſlaughter at Cannæ, was commanded to go into Sicily, and continue there as long as the war ſhould laſt in Italy. In exchange for them, the two legions, which had hitherto ſerved in Sicily, were ordered to Italy to ſerve there under the conſul, whom the centuries centuries were ſoon to appoint in the room of Poſthumius, who had been killed by the Boii. Terentius Varro, notwithſtanding his late miſconduct, was entruſted with the command of an army in Apulia, with the character of proconſul. When the time came for electing a new conſul, the tribes unanimouſly choſe Marcellus, notwithſtanding the intrigues of Sempronius, who, fearing he might be eclipſed by the extraordinary merit of that great man, had kept him out of the way. However, a ſtorm, attended with dreadful claps of thunder, happening to riſe during the aſſembly, it is incredible with what greedineſs the augurs took hold of this accident, to declare that the election of Marcellus was not agreeable to the gods. Marcellus was a plebeian, as was alſo his collegue Sempronius; and the patricians, unwilling to ſee two plebeian conſuls at the ſame time, influenced the augurs to pronounce the election of Marcellus diſagreeable to the gods. But the people would ot have acquieſced to the declaration of the augurs, had ot Marcellus ſhewed himſelf on this occaſion as zealous a publican, as he was a great commander; for he refuſed accept the faſces, though offered him by the whole body the people, ſaying, that he had rather lead a private life, an enjoy the greateſt honours in the republic, contrary o the will of the gods and the inclination of any of his ellow-citizens. Then the famous Fabius Maximus was hoſen in his ſtead, and raiſed a third time to the conulate [a].

[a] Liv. ibid. c. 22.

While the republic was buſy in making theſe elections and preparations for purſuing the war, Hannibal made himſelf maſter of Conſentia on the Crathis, of Croton, Locri, and ſeveral other cities in Great Greece. The Romans therefore took the field. Fabius put himſelf at the head of thoſe troops which the late dictator had commanded; Sempronius took upon him the command of the new levies made at Rome, conſiſting moſtly of ſlaves, to whom were added twenty-five thouſand auxiliaries. The prætor Lævinus was ordered to cover Apulia with two legions. Marcellus was appointed to command the troops with which he had defended Nola; but ſuch among them as had eſcaped from the battle at Cannæ were ſent over to Sicily, their room being ſupplied by two legions from that iſland. Laſtly, Terentius Varro led an army into Picenum, to defend that country and raiſe recruits there [b].

As

[a] Liv. ibid. Plut. in Marcell. [b] Liv. & Plut. ibid.

As Campania was now the ſeat of the war, the Campanians, who had eſpouſed the cauſe of Hannibal, raiſed an army of about fourteen thouſand men of their own nation, and put one Marius Alfius at the head of it. His firſt attempt was upon the city of Cumæ, which adhered to the Romans. The Cuman ſenators, and thoſe of the other cities of Campania, uſed annually to meet at a place called Hamæ, not far from Cumæ, to perform a ſolemn ſacrifice, and deliberate upon the general affairs of the province. Alfius formed a ſcheme of ſurpriſing on this occaſion the ſenators of Cumæ; but they, ſuſpecting his deſign, gave notice of it to the conſul Sempronius, who, as he lay within ſix miles of them, fell on the Campanian army in the night, killed two thouſand of them, among whom was their leader Alfius, and put the reſt to flight. However, as Hannibal was not far off, Sempronius, unwilling to expoſe his unexperienced troops to the danger of a battle, immediately retired, and ſhut himſelf up in Cumæ, which Hannibal inveſted; but was obliged to raiſe the ſiege after he had loſt thirteen hundred men in that unſucceſsful attempt. At the ſame time, another Sempronius, ſurnamed Longus, who commanded a body of troops in Lucania, gained a conſiderable victory over Hanno, and Lævinus retook three cities in the country of the Hirpini, which had revolted to Hannibal. During theſe tranſactions, embaſſadors from Philip king of Macedon to Hannibal being intercepted and ſent to Rome, the ſenate found, that a treaty of alliance offenſive and defenſive was actually concluded between the Macedonian and Carthaginian. In order therefore to keep the former out of Italy, Lævinus was ordered to embarque at Tarentum, ſail for Macedon, and find king Philip employment at home. And now Fabius, who had hitherto continued quiet in his camp at Cale, being well appriſed that his rival's remiſſneſs was not feigned, as he had imagined, but real, boldly paſſed the Vulturnus, and croſſing a large plain near mount Tifata, on which Hannibal was encamped, joined his collegue Sempronius at Cumæ. On the other hand, Marcellus, who was encamped at Nola, made daily incurſions into the countries of the Hirpini and Samnites, who had revolted to Hannibal, committing every-where dreadful devaſtations. The Samnites, ſurpriſed to find Hannibal ſo unactive and ſo little zealous in their defence, ſent deputies to him, and by their repeated complaints prevailed upon him at laſt to come to their aſſiſtance. Upon his approach Marcellus retired behind the walls of Nola, which which Hannibal immediately inveſted with his whole army. After he had for ſome days battered the walls with incredible fury, Marcellus, thinking it leſs dangerous to engage the enemy in the open field, than in the narrow ſtreets of Nola, the walls being already half-ruined, reſolved to put the whole to the iſſue of a general action. Accordingly, he marched out with his men in good order, and after having obliged the Carthaginians, who were carrying on the ſiege, to retire to their camp, which was about a mile from the city, he drew up his ſmall army in the plain between the Carthaginian camp and the city. Hannibal could not perſuade himſelf, that Marcellus, whoſe forces were ſo much inferior in number to his own, really deſigned to hazard a battle; however, after having encouraged his men with a ſhort harangue, in which he treated the Romans with the utmoſt contempt, he advanced boldly, not doubting but the enemy would retire, at the ſight of his army in battalia, behind the walls of the city. He was therefore greatly ſurpriſed, when he ſaw the Romans not only ſtand their ground, but at the very firſt onſet put his advance-guard into diſorder. Marcellus had armed his infantry with long pikes, uſed only at ſea, and chiefly in boarding of ſhips, and taught them how to manage this new kind of weapon, in order to keep the enemy at a diſtance; ſo that the Carthaginians, who carried only ſhort javelins, finding it impoſſible to hurt the Romans, while they themſelves were run through with their long pikes, began to retire, and, in ſpite of all Hannibal could do, to ſave themſelves by flight to their camp. Marcellus purſued them cloſe, and before they got to the camp killed five thouſand of them, and took ſix hundred priſoners, nineteen ſtandards, and two elephants, which with ſome others had been lately ſent from Carthage. Marcellus loſt about a thouſand men, who were trod down by the Numidian horſe, headed by Hannibal in perſon. The Romans, encouraged by this advantage, aſked leave of their general to attack Hannibal's camp; but the wiſe Marcellus, without hearkening to their requeſt, ſounded a retreat and returned to Nola, which he entered amidſt the acclamations of the citizens. After this defeat, Hannibal had the further mortification to be abandoned by twelve hundred and ſeventy-two of his beſt horſe, partly Spaniards and partly Numidians, who had croſſed the Alps with him. Some diſcontent was, without all doubt, the occaſion of their deſertion; but they gave out, that the eſteem they had conceived for the Marcellus defeats Hannibal in a pitched battle.

The conſul Sempronius routs the Campanians.

A body of Hannibal's beſt horſe deſert to the Romans.

the Romans induced them to it. Be that as it will, they continued ever after faithful to the republic, and did her important ſervices; for which they were, in their old age, rewarded with lands in their own countries, when the Romans had conquered Africa and Spain. Hannibal was ſo touched with the reproach, which this deſertion of his old companions in victory threw upon him, that he left Campania, and, retiring into Apulia, encamped near Arpi. He was no ſooner gone, than Fabius, drawing near to Capua, laid waſte the whole country about it, and then encamped at Sueſſula within reach of Naples and Nola, in order to ſuccour them in caſe they were attacked. In the mean time, winter approaching, Fabius, either out of jealouſy, or to leſſen the expences of the republic, ordered Marcellus to diſband his army, and to leave in Nola a ſufficient garriſon to defend it. Marcellus obeyed, but did not go to Rome with his diſbanded troops, chuſing rather to ſtay at Nola, than to be importuned at Rome by his friends, who were for his ſolliciting the conſulate in the next election. As he had contributed more to the glory of the republic and the diſcredit of Hannibal, than all the generals of Rome, and even Fabius himſelf, he was reſolved to owe his promotion wholly to his merit and ſervices; and therefore, diſdaining to offer himſelf as a candidate in the comitia, or to court the favour of the people, he ſpent the winter in tranquillity at Nola [c].

Sardinia once more reduced.

Afdrubal defeated by the Scipios in Spain.

DURING theſe tranſactions in Italy, the prætor Manlius Torquatus defeated the Sardinians, who had revolted, though aſſiſted by an army ſent from Carthage, under the command of Aſdrubal, ſurnamed The Bald, killed twelve thouſand of the enemy upon the ſpot, took Aſdrubal himſelf with Hanno and Mago his chief officers priſoners, and reduced the whole iſland. The two Scipios were equally ſucceſsful in their wars in Spain, where with an army only of ſixteen thouſand men they gained a complete victory over Aſdrubal, whoſe forces amounted to the number of ſixty thouſand. But the accounts which the ſenate received from Sicily were not ſo ſatisfactory. Good king Hiero, who had continued ſo faithful to the republic for fifty years together, had lately ended his days there, and had been ſucceeded by his grandſon Hieronymus, who, having inſulted the Roman embaſſadors, made a treaty of alliance with the Carthaginians, and was entirely governed by their counſels.

[c] Lib. ibid. 46. Zonar. l. ix. c. 3.

counſels. This gave no ſmall uneaſineſs to the ſenate, who thereupon ordered new levies to be raiſed and ſent into Sicily. But, in the mean time, the conſular year being near expired, Fabius returned to Rome to preſide at the election of the new conſuls. On the day appointed the tribes aſſembled, and the majority of the firſt tribe that voted nominated to the conſulſhip T. Otacilius and M. Æmilius Regillus, both men of merit, but yet not of ſuch abilities as the preſent neceſſities required. Fabius therefore, interrupting the election for a ſhort time, exhorted the tribes to chuſe ſuch conſuls as they would name, if they were to appoint two generals to give Hannibal battle. As to thoſe they had already named, he told them, that he could not be ſo partial to them, as to think them capable of making head againſt the crafty and experienced African. He then ordered the firſt tribe to return to their voting-place and give their ſuffrages anew. Otacilius, who was nearly related to Fabius, made at firſt ſome oppoſition to this; but the lictors, ſurrounding him with their axes, ſoon forced him to be ſilent. Then the tribes unanimouſly choſe Fabius himſelf and Claudius Marcellus, though abſent. Rome had never ſeen two greater men together at the head of affairs. Fabius had indeed by an irregular proceeding contributed to his own continuance in the conſular dignity, contrary to law and cuſtom; but yet no one accuſed him of ambition or tyranny, or imagined him actuated by any other motive than that of zeal for his country. The firſt thing the new conſuls did was, to raiſe ſix legions to be added to the twelve already on foot. As the Sicilian expedition ſeemed to require moſt diſpatch, Otacilius was ordered to embarque with all expedition for that iſland; and, in order to equip a fleet for that ſervice, each head of a family, who by the laſt cenſor's regiſter was found worth from fifty thouſand to a hundred thouſand aſſes, was obliged to maintain a rower or ſailor at his own expence for ſix months; and the more wealthy, three, five, ſeven, in proportion to their riches. The ſenators obliged themſelves to maintain eight men each for one year; ſo that a fleet was ſoon manned and equipped, without being any ways chargeable to the republic [d].

Fabius Maximus and Marcellus elected conſuls.

And now the land forces began to be in motion, when the Capuans, terrified at the extraordinary number of the forces of the republic commanded by ſo many able generals,

[d] Liv. l. xxiv. c. 11. Val. Max. l. v. c. 6.

rals, recalled Hannibal, who, quitting Apulia and returning to his camp on mount Tifata, ordered Hanno, at the head of seventeen thousand foot and twelve hundred horse, to seize Beneventum. But Sempronius, by the direction of Fabius, having got to that city before the Carthaginian, made himself master of it, and then marched to meet Hanno, in order to give him battle. Sempronius's army consisted mostly of Volones, and the general in order to engage them to exert themselves, promised every man his liberty, who should bring off the head of an enemy, the senate having impowered him to set at liberty such of his slaves as he pleased. No soldiers ever shewed a greater eagerness to engage an enemy, than the Volones did after Sempronius had made them this promise. They ranged themselves round the prætorium by break of day, soliciting the general to lead them against the enemy, that they might deliver themselves from slavery, either by death or victory. Sempronius did not suffer their ardor to cool, but immediately led them into a neighbouring plain, through which Hanno was to pass, as Sempronius had been informed, on his march to Beneventum, not knowing that the Romans were already masters of that city. Accordingly, the Roman army was scarce drawn up, when Hanno appeared at the head of seventeen thousand foot, mostly Brutians and Lucanians, and twelve hundred Numidian horse. The Carthaginian advanced in good order into the plain, not doubting, but he should soon put to the rout a handful of slaves, accustomed to tremble, as he told his soldiers, at the voice of their masters. In the mean time the trumpets sounded, and the attack began with incredible fury on both sides. The Volones fought with great bravery; but the promise Sempronius made them had like to have occasioned an entire defeat of his army. He had promised liberty to such only as carried off the head of an enemy; as soon therefore as any of them had dispatched his antagonist, he made it his whole business to cut off his head, and lost a great deal of time in that butchery. Besides the ardor of those who had performed the condition, on which they were to obtain their liberty, immediately abated; so that Sempronius was forced to publish a new declaration through all the ranks of his army, That none should obtain their liberty, unless the Carthaginians were routed. Upon this the brave slaves renewed the fight with fresh vigour, and gained so complete a victory, that scarce two thousand of the enemy escaped. Sixteen thousand of them them were killed either on the field of battle, or in the camp, which the volones forced after they had driven them out of the plain. However, four thouſand of Sempronius's ſlaves did not behave ſo well as the reſt, being afraid to purſue the enemy to their camp. Theſe aſhamed of their cowardice, retired after the battle to a high mountain, for fear of becoming the jeſt of their companions. But Sempronius ſent a tribune to invite them back; and then, to perform his promiſe, declared them all free without exception. However, to make ſome diſtinction between the brave and the cowards, he obliged the latter to take their meals ſtanding, all the time they were in the ſervice [e].

Sempronius with an army of Volones defeats Hannibal.

Marcellus gains a conſiderable advantage over Hannibal near Nola.

In the mean time, Hannibal, leaving his camp on mount Tifata, took his rout to Nola, being invited thither by the populace, who were ſtill in his intereſt, in oppoſition to the ſenate. But Marcellus receiving timely notice of his march, followed him, and coming up with him near that city, killed two thouſand of his men, with the loſs only of four hundred. The Romans would in all likelihood have given him a total overthrow, had Claudius Nero, whom the conſul had detached with a body of horſe, to take a large compaſs and fall upon the Carthaginians in the rear during the action, come up in time. Marcellus offered Hannibal battle the next day, but he declined it, and decamped in the night, laying aſide all thoughts of taking Nola, which had ſo often proved fatal to his glory. From Nola he led his army to Tarentum, where ſome Tarentine priſoners, whom he had formerly ſent home without ranſom, had engaged many young men in his intereſt. But the proprætor Lævinus, who guarded that coaſt, took ſuch effectual means to prevent the deſigns of the factious, that the Carthaginian, being again diſappointed, abandoned the enterpriſe, and took the road to Salapia, a city in Apulia, with a deſign to ſpend the winter there. As the ſeaſon was not yet far advanced, Fabius undertook the ſiege of Caſilinum, which was garriſoned by two thouſand Campanians and ſeven hundred Carthaginians, under the command of a Capuan of diſtinction, named Statius Metius. The conſul had no ſooner inveſted the place, than Magius, prætor of Capua, which was but two miles from Caſilinum, formed a ſtrong body of troops, and armed even the ſlaves, with a deſign to attack the Romans in their trenches. Fabius receiving intelligence of theſe preparations, wrote to his colleague legue Marcellus, either to come in perſon, or to ſend the prætor Sempronius, with two legions to cover the ſiege. Hereupon Marcellus, leaving only two thouſand men in Nola, for Hannibal was then in winter-quarters in Apulia, marched with the reſt of his army to join Fabius. And now the two greateſt generals, Rome had, acted together for the firſt time, the one carrying on the ſiege, and the other covering it with an army, ready to engage Hannibal or the Capuans, in caſe they ſhould attempt to relieve the place. The garriſon made ſo vigorous a defence, that Fabius, diſcouraged by the daily ſlaughter of his men, would have raiſed the ſiege, had not Marcellus preſſed him to purſue it; which he did with ſuch vigour, that the Campanians, having loſt all hopes of being relieved, either by Hannibal or their prætor Magius, ſent deputies to Fabius, aſking leave to march out of the place and return to Capua. The conſul conſented to what they aſked, knowing it would not be long ere the city ſurrendered, when defended only by a ſmall number of Carthaginians. But Marcellus, watching the time, when the Campanians were to march out of the city, ſeized the gate before fifty of them were out, and entering the place, put all to the ſword, without diſtinction, who oppoſed him. Thoſe who threw down their arms, whether Capuans or Carthaginians, were made priſoners of war, and ſent to Rome, Marcellus pretending that he was not obliged to ſtand to the agreement made by his collegue. Fabius being now maſter of Caſilinum, laid waſte great part of Campania, killed or took priſoners near twenty-five thouſand men, made incurſions into Samnium, where he ſurpriſed three hundred and ſeventy Roman deſerters, and ſent them to Rome, where they were firſt beaten with rods, and then thrown down the Tarpeian rock. Fabius had alſo the ſatisfaction to hear that his ſon had gained great glory in Apulia, where he took the city of Accua, almoſt in ſight of the Carthaginian army. As for Marcellus, he returned to Nola, where he was ſeized with a diſtemper, which for ſome time ſuſpended his martial ardor [f].

[e] Liv. ibid.

Caſilinum retaken by the Romans.

Accua in Apulia taken by young Fabius.

In the mean time, Philip king of Macedon, who, as we have obſerved above, had concluded an offenſive and defenſive alliance with Hannibal, began to move and draw towards Italy. He firſt laid ſiege to Apollonia, a city at the [f] Liv. l. xxiv. c. 19. Plut in Fab.

the head of the Adriatic ſea; but not ſucceeding in that deſign, he turned his arms againſt Oricum; the inhabitants of which city immediately ſent notice of their danger to the prætor Lævinus, who, in two days after the news, arrived at Oricum; and finding the city already taken, eaſily recovered it, and then formed a deſign of ſurpriſing in the night the king of Macedon in his camp; and executed it with ſuch ſucceſs, that Philip himſelf had fallen into the prætor's hands, had not a party of Macedonians, more reſolute than the reſt, carried him off half naked to his ſhips. Lævinus killed about three thouſand Macedonians, and took near twice that number of priſoners. The Macedonian fleet, which lay in the port of Oricum, not being able to get out to ſea, by reaſon the Roman fleet barred up the mouth of the harbour, Philip was obliged to ſet fire to his ſhips, and return by land to his own territories, with the miſerable remains of his ſhattered army [g].

Lævinus ſurpriſes the camp of the king of Macedon.

But Hannibal ſoon made himſelf amends for this diſappointment on the ſide of Macedon, by the troubles he found means to raiſe in Sicily; where, after ſeveral plots, counter-plots, and aſſaſſinations. Hippocrates and Epicydes, the two agents, whom Hannibal had ſent to make a treaty with king Hieronymus, were by the Syracuſans choſen into the college of prætors; ſo that Syracuſe being now wholly devoted to the Carthaginian intereſt, it was thought neceſſary to ſend Marcellus with his army from Nola to the aſſiſtance of Claudius and Lentulus, the two Roman prætors in Sicily. But as to the particulars of this glorious expedition, we refer our readers to our hiſtory of Sicily, where we have given a diſtinct account of all the tranſactions in that iſland, both civil and military, from the death of king Hiero to the entire reduction of the city and kingdom of Syracuſe by the brave Marcellus [h].

Marcellus ſent into Sicily.

In Spain, the two Scipios gained great advantages over the Carthaginians, who in two battles loſt above twenty thouſand men. The fruit of theſe ſucceſſes was the retaking of Saguntum, the city which had given riſe to the war. The old inhabitants, of whom few were now alive, were reinſtated in their poſſeſſions, and the Turdetani, who had formerly joined Hannibal againſt that faithful city, being obliged to ſurrender at diſcretion, were made ſlaves and ſold by auction [i].

The

[g] Liv. l. xxiv. c. 40.
[h] Vide Vol. vii. p. 338. & ſeq.
[i] Idem ibid. c. 41.

THE conſulſhip of Fabius Maximus and Marcellus being now expired, the conſcript fathers, to keep theſe two great men at the head of the armies, without infringing the laws, continued Marcellus in Sicily with the title of proconſul, and made him governor of all thoſe territories, which had formerly belonged to king Hiero. As for Fabius, that he might ſtill have the conduct of thoſe forces, which were to act againſt Hannibal, the centuries raiſed his ſon Q. Fabius to the conſulate, knowing that the father, who offered to ſerve under him, would have the chief direction of the campaign. With young Fabius was joined Sempronius Gracchus, who with an army of colones had defeated Hanno near Beneventum. The other generals were continued in their reſpective commands; the two Scipios remained in Spain; Terentius Varro in Picenum; Mucius Scævola in Sardinia; Otacilius commanded the fleet in Sicily, and Valerius Lævinus a ſquadron at Brunduſium, to watch the motions of the king of Macedon; the prætor Fulvius had the command of two legions near Sueſſula, and Sempronius Tuditanus was ſent with a body of troops into Ciſalpine Gaul. After the conſuls had continued at Rome as long as was neceſſary to calm the fears of the people, in relation to ſome odd events which ſuperſtition made formidable, young Fabius went to take upon him the command of the army, which was encamped near Sueſſula; and Sempronius at the ſame time ſet out for Lucania, where it had fallen to his lot to act. Fabius, purſuant to his father's directions, opened the campaign with the ſiege of Arpi, in which was a garriſon of five thouſand Carthaginians. As the city was weak on one ſide, but deemed impregnable on the other, the troops in the town, believing it would be undoubtedly attacked on the weaker ſide, all repaired thither; which gave the Fabii an opportunity of ſurpriſing the place in the night. After this the Fabii made it their whole buſineſs to follow Hannibal, who did not ſo much as attempt any conſiderable enterpriſe, during this campaign, but contented himſelf with ſtanding on the defenſive. The prætor Fulvius near Sueſſula watched the motions of the Capuans, and was much ſurpriſed to ſee an hundred and twelve brave men of their nobility arrive at his camp, and, declaring an abhorrence of the revolt of their countrymen, demand to be received again into the friendſhip of the Romans. This change in the minds of the nobility plainly ſhewed how much Hannibal had loſt his credit. The prætor Sempronius Tuditanus nus besieged and took by storm the city of Aternum, in the country of the Marrucini; and, with the booty he found there and the ransom of seven thousand prisoners, much enriched the treasury of the republic. The consul Sempronius gained considerable advantages in Lucania, and obliged part of Brutium to return to its former obedience. In Spain, the two Scipios not only made great progress, but extended their views even to Africa, where they engaged Syphax king of Masæsylia, the western part of Numidia, to take arms against Carthage. But, on the other hand, the Carthaginians, alarmed at the motions of Syphax, prevailed on Gala king of Massylia, the eastern part of Numidia, to join them. Gala himself was no warrior, but had a son in the flower of his age, whose inclinations were wholly for war. The young prince's name was Masinissa; he was then only seventeen years old; but his genius and conduct were such as made the Massylians conclude, that he would both enrich and enlarge his father's dominions. Gala put him at the head of his troops, and the young warrior, joining the Carthaginians, fell so vigorously and so seasonably on the Masæsylians, that they were entirely routed, and lost thirty thousand men in the action. The vanquished king retired into Mauritania, made new levies, and prepared to pass the straights, and join the Scipios in Spain; but the great Masinissa gave him a second overthrow, which put him out of a condition of trying the fortune of arms again for a long time [k].

Arpi taken by the Romans.

And Aternum.

Syphax defeated by Masinissa.

And now the time for the new elections drawing near, as both consuls were engaged abroad, Sempronius, the elder of them, nominated C. Claudius Centho dictator to hold the comitia, in which Q. Fulvius Flaccus and Appius Claudius Pulcher were chosen consuls for the new year. At the same time P. Cornelius Scipio and his brother Lucius, the sons of the proconsul in Spain, were elected curule ædiles, though the elder was but twenty years of age, and the laws required that every candidate for that office should be thirty. The personal merit of young Cornelius Scipio, and that of his father and uncle, made the people dispense with their old customs [l]. While the new consuls were busy at Rome in raising two legions to be added to the twenty-one already on foot, and in prosecuting some publicans guilty of notorious frauds, Hannibal, having made himself master of Tarentum by the treachery of the inhabitants, Tarentum betrayed to Hannibal.

[k] Liv, l. xxiv. c. 49.

[l] Liv. l. xxv. c. 2. Polyb. l. x. c. 5.

bitants, laid ſiege to the citadel, whither Livius, the commander of the Roman garriſon in the city, had retired. Hereupon the conſuls, leaving Rome, joined their forces; and, in order to divert the Carthaginian from purſuing the ſiege he had undertaken, entered Campania, laid waſte the country round Capua, and threatened that city with a ſiege. The Capuans immediately diſpatched deputies to Hannibal, entreating him to haſten to their aſſiſtance, and acquainting him, that, by the devaſtation of their fields, they began already to feel the miſeries of a ſiege. The Carthaginian, unwilling to raiſe the ſiege of the citadel, which began to be ſtreightened for want of proviſions, ordered Hanno with an army from Brutium to the relief of his favourite city. Hanno, purſuant to his orders, left Brutium; and, having collected an immenſe quantity of corn, pitched his camp near Beneventum, ordering the Capuans to ſend their waggons to fetch it from thence. In the mean time, the conſuls being informed by the people of Beneventum of all that paſſed, Fulvius marched thither with all expedition, and entering the town in the night unknown to Hanno, appeared the next morning by break of day before the enemy's camp. Two thouſand waggons were arrived from Capua, and the peaſants, mixing with the ſoldiers, cauſed great confuſion. However, as the camp was ſituated upon an aſcent, and therefore very difficult to be taken by aſſault, the conſul was for quitting the enterprize, or at leaſt ſuſpending it till the arrival of his collegue. But the legionaries ſignalized their bravery, on this occaſion, beyond the expectation of their general. One Vibius, a centurion of the Latin troops, and after his example Pedanius, a centurion of the third Roman legion, threw each a ſtandard over the enemy's ramparts, crying out, Let us be the curſe of all men, if we do not recover theſe enſigns out of the enemy's hands. Hereupon the ſoldiers, encouraging each other, croſſed the ditch, and, climbing up the rampart in ſpite of all oppoſition, forced the Carthaginian camp, and made a dreadful ſlaughter of their troops. Above ſix thouſand of them were killed, and about ſeven thouſand made priſoners. The booty was exceeding great; corn, forage, waggons, horſes, Hanno's baggage, the utenſils of the Carthaginians, and whatever they had brought from the neighbouring countries, fell a prey to the Roman ſoldiers. As for Hanno, he made his eſcape, attended only by a ſmall body of horſe, and through by-roads returned into Brutium [m].

Hanno defeated, and his camp taken by the Romans.

THE taking of the Carthaginian camp and the abſence of Hanno threw the Capuans into the utmoſt conſternation. Being more apprehenſive of a ſiege than ever, they ſent a new deputation to Hannibal, preſſing him to come to their aſſiſtance. But he was ſo intent upon reducing the citadel of Tarentum, that he could not be prevailed upon to move from thence. Hereupon the conſuls drew near to Capua, with a deſign to beſiege it in form. As they did not doubt, but Hannibal would haſten to the relief of his faithful Capuans, they ordered Sempronius Gracchus to leave Lucania, and encamp with his army of Volones in the neighbourhood of Capua. Sempronius had already named his ſucceſſor to command in that province, and was preparing for his march, when one Fulvius, a Lucanian, who had been hitherto very zealous for the intereſt of Rome, changed his inclination on a ſudden, and in order to recommend himſelf to the Carthaginians by ſome ſignal ſervice, reſolved to betray the proconſul to them. The traitor abuſing the confidence Sempronius placed in him, told him, that before he left Lucania, he would fain procure him the glory of uniting all the hearts of his countrymen in the intereſts of Rome, and pretended, that the heads of the Carthaginian faction deſired a private conference. The brave Roman, not ſuſpecting any deceit, went to the place appointed, attended only with his lictors and a ſmall body of horſe. But he no ſooner arrived, than he was ſurrounded by a great body of horſe and foot under the command of Mago, who had concealed himſelf behind a neighbouring hill. The proconſul, finding it impoſſible to make his eſcape, cried out to his ſmall troop, We are betrayed and muſt die. Let us therefore ſignalize the laſt of our days with a behaviour worthy of Romans. Let us turn our arms chiefly againſt the traitor Fulvius, and ſend him to the infernal regions before us. Having thus ſpoke, he diſmounted, and, wrapping his left arm in his paludamentum, or military cloak, for want of a buckler, flew ſword in hand to the place where he ſaw Fulvius, in hopes of killing the traitor before he fell himſelf. But he periſhed in the attempt, the Carthaginians being obliged by the great ſlaughter he made in the heart of their battalions to diſpatch him, though they had been ordered by Mago to take take him alive. Thus periſhed one of the beſt generals of the republic, at a time when ſhe abounded with great men [n]. The body of this great man was carried to Hannibal's camp, who could not help ſhewing marks of eſteem for ſo great a commander. He erected a funeral pile for him at the gate of his camp, and ordered his cavalry to make their evolutions round it in honour of the deceaſed. Upon his death, the volones, thinking themſelves diſcharged from their military oath, diſbanded, ſo that the conſul's project of beſieging Capua was a little diſconcerted.

The proconſul Sempronius betrayed and killed.

[m] Lib. I. xxv. c. 13, 14. Val. Max. I, iii. c. 2.

To this misfortune was added another on the ſide of Spain, which threw the republic into the utmoſt conſternation. News was brought to Rome, that both the Scipios were killed. The circumſtances of their death are thus related: The Carthaginians had three armies in Spain commanded by three officers of reputation, viz. Aſdrubal, Hannibal's brother, Mago, and another Aſdrubal, the ſon of Giſco. The two latter had united their forces and encamped together; the former commanded an army apart, but without removing far from his collegues. The two Roman generals likewiſe ſeparated and divided their troops. Publius, who was proconſul and the eldeſt, took two thirds of the Roman ſoldiers, and, leaving his brother the reſt with thirty thouſand Celtiberian auxiliaries, marched towards the poſt, which Mago and his collegue poſſeſſed, about five days journey from the Roman camp. During his abſence, the Celtiberians, being bribed by Aſdrubal with large ſums, deſerted their general, and, marching away, left him in a melancholy ſituation. His brother Publius was already a great way off, and he was no-ways in a condition, having but a handful of Romans with him, either to keep thirty thouſand in awe, or without them to defend his camp againſt the numerous forces of Aſdrubal. His only refuge therefore was to retire, and keep at a diſtance from the enemy, which he did accordingly, paſſing the Iberus, and keeping that river between him and Aſdrubal's army. In the mean time, his brother Publius, arriving after five days march at the poſt, which Mago, and Aſdrubal, the ſon of Giſco, poſſeſſed, was informed, that Maſiniſſa, after having conquered Syphax in Africa, had paſſed the ſtreights, and joined the Carthaginians with his victorious army. This gave no ſmall uneaſineſs to the proconſul,

The two Scipios defeated and killed in Spain.

[n] Idem ibid. c. 16.

ful, who expected to engage only the Carthaginians, under the command of Mago and the ſon of Giſco. Notice was brought him at the ſame time, that a Spaniſh prince, named Indibilis, was in full march from the country of the Lacetani, where he reigned, to join the Carthaginians with ſeven thouſand five hundred men. Upon this intelligence, he decamped in the night, with a deſign to obſtruct the march of Indibilis, and fight him before he reached the enemy's camp. Accordingly, the next morning he met him, and had already ſurrounded him on all ſides, when all on a ſudden Maſiniſſa, who had narrowly watched his motions, appeared at the head of a numerous body of Numidian horſe, and unexpectedly attacked the Roman army in flank. The fight was then renewed with great fury on both ſides. Indibilis returned with his Lacetani to the charge; and at the ſame time Mago and the ſon of Giſco arriving, contrary to the proconſul's expectation, attacked his army in the rear. The brave Scipio, thus ſurrounded by three armies, flew from manipulus to manipulus, fighting as a common ſoldier in one place, and giving orders as a general in another. Thus, by his activity and undaunted courage, he kept up the ſpirits of his legionaries, who withſtood with an unparallelled bravery the numerous forces of the enemy, till their gallant commander was run through with a lance and left dead on the ſpot. Hereupon the Numidian horſe, who ſaw him fall, gave a great ſhout, crying out, The Roman general is dead. The death of ſo brave a commander damped the courage of the Romans, who thought of nothing now but retiring in good order. They cut their way, ſword in hand, through the enemy's infantry; but Maſiniſſa, falling upon them with his Numidian cavalry, put them in diſorder, and made ſuch a dreadful havock of them, that not one of the Romans would have eſcaped, had not night, which very ſeaſonably overtook them, obliged the Numidian to give over the purſuit.

In the mean time, Cneius, knowing nothing either of the death of his brother or the defeat of his legions, kept advancing on the banks of the Iberus towards the provinces of Spain, which were well affected to the Romans; when all on a ſudden he ſaw a very numerous army advancing towards him, and was ſoon after informed, that his brother was killed, his army entirely defeated, and his troops either diſperſed or cut in pieces. At this news he ſunk into a deep melancholy, and not being able to gain any

any better retreat, he poſted himſelf on the top of an eminence, where the nature of the ground, which was very rocky, would not ſuffer him to make any fortifications, but with the baggage of the army. In this poſt the ſmall body he commanded was attacked by all the Carthaginian forces in Spain, under the conduct of the two Aſdrubals, of Mago, Maſiniſſa, and their ally Indibilis, who, after the defeat of Publius, had united their forces, in order to fall upon Cneius, and put an end to the war in Spain at one blow. The Romans, though ſurrounded on all ſides by numerous armies, forced their way through the enemy's battalions, without ſo much as offering to ſurrender; and, gaining the neighbouring mountains, eſcaped through by-ways to the camp of the deceaſed proconſul, which they found guarded by a ſmall number of troops, under the command of T. Fonteius, one of Publius's lieutenants. As for the brave Cneius, he loſt his life with a conſiderable number of legionaries in the action. Some writers tell us, that he retired, with ſome brave men, to a neighbouring tower, in which, the enemy having ſet fire to it, he was either ſtifled with the ſmoak, or burnt. Thus all the hopes of the Romans in Spain ſeemed extinguiſhed by the death of the two Scipios, who had been the chief ſupport of the republic, and had done her greater ſervices in thoſe countries, than Hannibal had done her hurt in Italy. The conſcript fathers now looked upon the affairs of Rome as quite ruined in Spain. But a young Roman knight, named C. Marcius, who had been brought up under Cneius, and had a wonderful genius for war, ſoon repaired the misfortunes which had made the wiſeſt men in the ſenate deſpond. Marcius, not diſcouraged by the loſs of two battles, put himſelf in motion, and being unanimouſly choſen general by the troops, he gathered together the fugitives, and repulſed Aſdrubal. the ſon of Giſco, who came to attack him in his camp. The brave Marcius, encouraged with this ſucceſs, formed a deſign, which would have been deemed a raſh attempt, had not his preſent circumſtances authorized it. The very next night he marched boldly to the enemy's camp, ſurpriſed it, and, having ſhut up all the paſſages out of it, ſet fire to the tents, which were covered with thatch. In the general confuſion, which the flames and the ſhouts of the Romans occaſioned, ſome of the Carthaginians haſtened to the gates of the camp, where they were cut in pieces by the legionaries who guarded them. Others leaped down from the top of the ramparts, but in endeavouring vouring to make their escape, were intercepted by the squadrons, which Marcius had placed in all the avenues leading to the camp. As they were unarmed and most of them naked, for Marcius surprised the camp in the dead of the night, the massacre was general. We are told, that the number of the dead on the side of the Carthaginians amounted to thirty-seven thousand, and that of the prisoners to eighteen hundred and thirty. Thus the mighty projects of the Carthaginian generals were entirely defeated, and Rome, notwithstanding the great losses she had sustained, maintained herself in possession of the provinces she had given up for lost [o].

The Carthaginians defeated in Spain by C. Marcius.

The first care of the brave Marcius after so signal a victory was, to dispatch couriers with letters to the senate, informing them of his success, and demanding succours and provisions to enable him to maintain the war. In these letters he unluckily styled himself proprætor, a title which he had acquired only by a military election in the camp; and this slight offence against the authority of the haughty republic was resented to such a degree, that, notwithstanding the important services of Marcius, the senate resolved to recal him, and send another general in his room. Nay, some were for treating him as a criminal, and citing him as such to appear forthwith before the tribes. But the greater number chose to act a more moderate part, and, suppressing the title of proprætor in their answer, sent Marcius word, that they would take care to supply the Roman soldiers in Spain with cloaths and provisions. They thought it a dangerous precedent for the legions to assume the liberty of chusing their own commanders; and therefore they thought it necessary to convene the tribes, as soon as they conveniently could, in order to appoint another commander in the room of Marcius [p]. But, in the mean time, the consular year being ready to expire, Appius Claudius was recalled from Capua to preside in the comitia, when P. Sulpicius Galba and Cn. Fabius Centumalus were raised to the consular dignity. Apulia was assigned to them for their province, while the late consuls were, in quality of proconsuls; to continue the siege of Capua, which they shut up on all sides, proposing to reduce it rather by famine, than by force. But, notwithstanding the vigilance of the two proconsuls, a Numidian horseman, having crossed the Capua shut up on all sides by the Romans.

Roman

[o] Liv. l. xxv. c. 39. Plin. l. ii. c. 107. Val. Max. l. i. c. 6.

[p] Liv. l. xxvi. c. 22.

Roman camp in the night, without being diſcovered, carried the news to Hannibal of the extremity to which the city was reduced. This engaged him at length to leave the blockade of the citidal of Tarentum, and march to the relief of the diſtreſſed city with his horſe, light-armed infantry, and thirty-three elephants. He found means to give the beſieged notice when he intended to attack the Romans, ordering them to make a vigorous ſally at the ſame time. The proconſuls, upon the firſt notice of the approach of the enemy, divided their troops, Appius taking upon him to make head againſt the garriſon, and Fulvius to defend the intrenchments againſt Hannibal, who, at the time agreed on before-hand with the Capuans, began the attack with incredible fury, while the garriſon, under the command of Hanno and Boſtar, two Carthaginian generals, fell upon the Romans at the ſa e time. Appius found no difficulty in repulſing the garriſon; and would have entered the city with them, had he not been wounded at the very gate, and by his wound diſabled from purſuing his deſign. As for Fulvius, he found it more difficult to withſtand the troops of Hannibal, who exerted themſelves with ſuch courage, reſolution, and intrepidity, as can hardly be expreſſed. A body of Spaniards and Numidians had even the boldneſs to paſs the ditch, and, in ſpite of all oppoſition, climbing the ramparts, penetrated into the Roman camp. But as they were not ſeconded by the other troops, they were all to a man cut in pieces, which ſo diſheartened the Carthaginian general, eſpecially after the garriſon was repulſed, that he ſounded a retreat, which was made in good order. Some writers tell us, that eight thouſand of Hannibal's army, and three thouſand of the Capuan garriſon, were killed upon the ſpot, and that fifteen colours were taken from the former, and eigteen from the latter. Be that as it will; for there is a great diſagreement among authors as to the number of the dead; it is certain, that Hannibal was much perplexed what ſtep to take next, it being impoſſible for him to ſubſiſt long in a country, which was ruined and laid waſte. At length he formed a deſign worthy of himſelf, and the fitteſt to ſupport his glory and credit. He reſolved to march directly to Rome, and ſurpriſe that capital, while the inhabitants expected nothing leſs than to ſee Hannibal at their gates. One advantage at leaſt he concluded would attend this enterpriſe, which was a diverſion of the Roman forces before Capua; by which means Hannibal attempts in vain to relieve Capua.

Hannibal marches to Rome.

means proviſions might be conveyed more eaſily into that city. That the Capuans might not be ſo diſheartened by his abſence as to haſtily ſurrender, he found means to acquaint them with his deſign. The news of Hannibal's approach cauſed great apprehenſions at Rome. Some of the ſenators were for calling all the armies in Italy into the neighbourhood of Rome. But the great Fabius oppoſed this opinion, telling the conſcript fathers, that Hannibal's deſign was not to take Rome, but to deliver Capua. However, a middle way was taken, and meſſengers were ſent to the proconſuls, informing them of the ſtate of affairs, and leaving it to their judgment, either to continue both before Capua, or for one of them, with ſuch forces as could be ſpared, to come to the relief of the capital. Upon this it was agreed by the two collegues, that Appius ſhould continue before Capua, and that Fulvius, with fifteen thouſand foot and a thouſand horſe, ſhould march to Rome. He ſet out accordingly, but took a different rout from Hannibal, the latter going by the Latin way, and the former by the Appian. The Roman troops were plentifully ſupplied with proviſions on their march by the allies and ſubjects of Rome; ſo that they met with no obſtruction, except in paſſing the Vulturnus, Hannibal having ſeized and burnt all the boats, which obliged the proconſul to ſpend ſome time in cutting timber, and makeing rafts to convey over his troops. As for Hannibal, he took a great compaſs before he came in ſight of Rome. From Capua he went to Cale, and from thence to Sidicinum; from Sidicinum he directed his march to Sueſſa, then to Allifæ. From this latter place he returned to the Latin way, and paſſing through Caſinum, Aquinum, and Interamna, encamped in the plains of Fregellæ. Hereupon the Fregellani, having firſt ſent one of their citizens with orders to travel night and day, in order to acquaint the ſenate with the approach of Hannibal, broke down their bridge on the Liris, which ſtopped the enemy's march for ſome time. However, after he had laid waſte the lands of the Fregellani, and built a new bridge over the Liris, he arrived at length by the Prænestine way within eight hundred paces of Rome. The alarm, which the approach of ſo formidable an enemy gave in all the quarters of the city, is not to be expreſſed. Fulvius was not yet arrived with his reinforcement, which occaſioned great uneaſineſs and doubled their fears, the more timorous, eſpecially cially the women, whoſe ſhrieks were heard in all the ſtreets, believing he had been cut off with his whole army by Hannibal. But whille the city was in the utmoſt alarm, the proconſul appeared with his troops, and entered Rome by the gate Capena, having firſt received from the ſenate an authority equal to that of the conſuls for the better diſcharge of his employment. He marched through the city, and encamped with his army between the gates Eſquilina and Collina. The ædiles were charged to ſupply the camp with proviſions and all ſorts of ammunition; and the two conſuls, who had not yet left Rome, with the ſenate went thither to hold a council of war, in which due meaſures were taken for the defence of the city. The ſituation of Fulvius's camp was approved, and all the officers were aſſigned their poſts. The ramparts were lined with ſoldiers; troops were ſtationed at proper diſtances within the walls; and the ſenate thought it neceſſary to keep their aſſembly continually ſitting in the forum, to be ready againſt all emergencies. Theſe diſpoſitions ſo much intimidated Hannibal, that, deſpairing to compaſs his deſign of making himſelf maſter of Rome, he retired about three miles farther from it, and encamped beyond the Anio. Nevertheleſs, as he had the curioſity to ſatisfy himſelf of the condition of the enemy, he advanced at the head of two thouſand horſe towards the gate Collina, and appeared over-againſt the temple of Hercules. The proconſul Flaminius, provoked at this inſult, ſent out a detachment of cavalry to attack him; and at the ſame time ordered the twelve hundred Numidians, who had formerly deſerted from Hannibal, to ſupport the Roman cavalry. As they had been poſted by Fulvius on mount Aventine, they were obliged to march through the city; which they did in good order. But as the people did not know that the proconſul had any Numidians in his army, they imagined the city ſurpriſed, and ſuch was the fright and conſternation upon this falſe apprehenſion, that moſt of the inhabitants would have abandoned the city, had not Hannibal been at the gates. In this panic many of the citizens took arms, and falling upon the Numidians, killed ſome of them before they were undeceived. At length the Numidians, with the utmoſt difficulty, made their way through the terrified crouds, joined the Roman ſquadrons, and with them obliged Hannibal to retire in ſome confuſion to his camp. But as the Carthaginian general had no mind to give over the enterpriſe, without being obliged to it by the loſs of a battle, in which he entertained great hopes of ſucceeding, he repaſſed the Anio, drew up his troops within reach of the enemy, and bid them defiance. Fulvius readily accepted the ehallenge, thinking he might venture a battle, almoſt without any danger, in ſight and at the foot of the ramparts of the city. Never were combatants more nearly concerned in intereſt, than both parties now were, to exert all their courage and reſolution. To take or preſerve Rome was the great end which the two armies propoſed to gain by the victory. When all things were ready for the onſet, a ſudden and violent ſtorm prevented the armies from engaging. The ſame thing happened the next day, when the ſtorm returned with ſuch violence, that both Romans and Carthaginians were obliged to return to their tents. To complete this prodigy, for it is looked upon as ſuch by ſome declamatory hiſtorians among the Latins, as ſoon as the armies had left the plain, the clouds diſappeared and the ſun returned. Polybius, who lived in, or ſoon after, thoſe times, and has given us a minute account of what paſſed on this occaſion, makes no mention either of preparations for an engagement, or of prodigies that prevented it. It is therefore probable, that Hannibal continued quiet in his camp, watching ſome favourable opportunity of putting his project in execution. As Rome was no longer alarmed, the ſenate provided for all affairs abroad with as much tranquillity, as if the enemy had been at a great diſtance.

A GOOD number of troops was ſent to reinforce the army in Spain; and this Hannibal looked upon as an inſult. But he was more concerned, when he was told by a deſerter, that a piece of land in the place, where he was then encamped, had been ſold at Rome as dear as if he had not been maſter of it. This exaſperated him to ſuch a degree, that he put up to ſale the bankers ſhops round the forum, and after this bravado drew nearer to the city, and encamped at a ſmall diſtance from the gate Capena. (Q). But he ſoon retired again, and encamping on the banks Hannibal retires from before Rome.

(Q). Feſtus tells us, that Hannibal, when near the city of Rome, ſaw ſpectres in the air, which filled him with a ſudden terror, and obliged him to turn back immediately; and hence, according to that author, came the name Rediculus, which was given by the Romans to a new divinity of their own making. For, after Hannibal's retreat, the Romans erected a temple in the way banks of the Turia, about ſix miles from Rome, ravaged the neighbouring country, and then marched into the territory of Capena; where he rifled a temple conſecrated to the goddeſs Feronia, carrying thence a conſiderable booty in gold and ſilver. He then purſued his march, paſſed the Liris, and, drawing near Capua, fell unexpectedly on Appius's camp in the night. A great number of Romans were killed on the ſpot, and Appius forced to leave his camp and fly to ſome eminences, where he intrenched himſelf, expecting every moment to be joined by his collegue Fulvius, who he apprehended could not be far off. But Hannibal, expecting to have all the Roman forces immediately upon him, abandoned all thoughts of relieving Capua, marched through Lucania and Brutium, and then entered the territory of Rhegium with ſuch expedition, that he had like to have ſurpriſed the city. In the mean time, Fulvius having rejoined his collegue before Capua, that city was ſoon reduced to the utmoſt extremity. The proconſuls offered to ſpare the lives of all thoſe who ſhould repair to the Roman camp; but not one Capuan accepted the offer. The commanders of the Carthaginian garriſon wrote letters to Hannibal, full of reproaches, and preſſing him not to deſert them in ſo ſhameful a manner. But one of the Numidians, to whoſe care theſe letters were committed, being betrayed by his miſtreſs, who had followed him into the Roman camp, both he and his companions were ſeized, and driven back into the city, after having been whipt and had their thumbs cut off. At the ſight of the maimed Numidians, the people in the utmoſt conſternation obliged the ſenate to aſſemble, way to the gate Capena, where he had encamped, conſecrating it to the god Rediculus. Others derive this name from the word ridiculus, which ſignifies any thing that deſerves to be laughed at. The ill ſucceſs of Hannibal's enterpriſe, ſay they, made the Romans very jocoſe upon him; and to perpetuate his ſhame, they erected a temple to the god Riſus or Laughter, whom they ſtyled rediculus or ridiculus. Varro, in his ſatire called "Hercules tuam fidem," gives this god the name of Tutanus, as if he had defended Rome againſt Hannibal. He makes this god ſpeak thus:

Noctu Hannibalis cum fugavi exercitum
Tutanus hoc, Tutanus Romæ nuncupor.
Hoc propter omnes, qui laborant, invocant.

aſſemble, in order to deliberate about the proper means of delivering them from the calamities which threatened them. Fear brought the ſenators together; and the majority were for ſurrendering upon the beſt terms they could obtain. But Vibius Virius, the chief author of the revolt, oppoſed this motion, and in a long ſpeech ſhewed them, that there was no room to hope for any favour from the Romans after ſo great provocations. He concluded his harangue, in which every thing favoured of rage and deſpair, with theſe words; 'Death is our only remedy. I 'have prepared a great entertainment at my houſe; where, 'after we have eat and drank plentifully, a cup of poiſon 'will end our days and misfortunes together. Let thoſe 'who deſpiſe life, follow me. A glorious death will pro-'cure us reſpect from the enemy, and the perfidious Han-'nibal will lament the loſs of allies, who did not deſerve 'to be thus deſerted and betrayed'. Twenty-ſeven of the aſſembled followed Virius, and cloſed the entertainment, to which they were invited, with a cup of poiſon. The reſt of the Capuans ſubmitted to the Romans, who were no ſooner in poſſeſſion of the city, than they ſeized the Carthaginian garriſon and all the Copuan ſenators. The Carthaginians were made priſoners of war; but the ſenators were tried by the proconſuls, and fifty-three of them, who had been the moſt active againſt Rome, were ſent to two neighbouring cities, twenty-five to Cale, and twenty-eight to Teanum, to be kept under cloſe confinement, till their fate was determined. For Appius being inclined to clemency, and Fulvius to ſeverity, the diſpute grew warm between them; and Appius to put an end to it, referred the matter to the conſcript fathers, and in the mean time ſent the priſoners to the above-mentioned cities. But his colleague, without waiting for the decree of the ſenate, marched out of the camp at midnight, and haſtening with two thouſand horſe firſt to Cale, and then to Teanum, cauſed the fifty-three ſenators to be firſt beaten with rods and then beheaded. He received, juſt before the execution of thoſe at Teanum, letters from Rome with orders to ſuſpend it; but he put the packet into his boſom, and did not open the letters till all was over. And yet the republic never blamed him for this inſtance of ſeverity; being, without all doubt, pleaſed to ſee herſelf revenged, without incurring the odious charge of inhumanity among her allies [q]. As to the city of Capua, the republic kept to Capua ſubmits to the Romans.

[q] Liv. l. xxvi. c. 12, 13, 14, 15.

to herſelf the property of thoſe fruitful plains and of the houſes in the city, and tranſplanted thither freedmen to manure the lands. Theſe were governed by a præfect ſent thither annually to preſerve order in the place, and to hear cauſes. As to the antient inhabitants, they were deprived of their eſtates and effects, and diſperſed without hopes of ever returning to their native city, ſome of them being ſold for ſlaves, and others confined to ſeveral priſons, where they periſhed with hunger.

THE taking of Capua, in a manner before Hannibal's face, ſunk his reputation in all the provinces of Italy. However, Philip, king of Macedon, was preparing to come into Italy, purſuant to his engagements with the Carthaginian general. But the pro prætor Lævinus, having drawn ſome of the Greek ſtates into a confederacy with Rome, found him ſo much work at home, that he gave over all thoughts of carrying his arms into Italy; as we have related at length in our hiſtory of Macedon.

Aſdrubal outwits the Roman commander in Spain.

IN Spain, Claudius Nero, who had been ſent to ſucceed the Scipios ſuffered himſelf to be ſhamefully outwitted by Aſdrubal, the brother of Hannibal. He had ſhut up the Carthaginians on a neck of land, where they were reduced to ſuch ſtreights, that Aſdrubal promiſed to leave Spain with all his troops, provided the Romans would only grant them their lives. Claudius accepted the propoſal; but the artful Carthaginian, ſtarting every day new difficulties about evacuating the cities he poſſeſſed, found means to convey in the mean while moſt part of his troops over the mountains in the night-time, without the knowledge of the enemy, who, after the ſigning of the treaty, did not keep ſo watchful an eye over them. At length all the infantry gained the plains, Aſdrubal being left in the camp with the cavalry only and the elephants; and even theſe he found means to ſave by the help of a thick fog, which covered both armies. When the weather cleared up, Claudius found the Carthaginian camp deſerted, and himſelf egregiouſly deluded. He purſued the enemy, but to no purpoſe; for Aſdrubal, having joined his infantry, retired in good order, and eſcaped with the loſs of a ſmall number of his men, who were killed in ſome ſkirmiſhes between his rear-guard and the van-guard of the Romans[r]. The ſenate and people of Rome were much mortified, when when they received this news; the centuries were immediately aſſembled to chuſe a proconſul, capable of retrieving the glory of the Roman name in Spain. But no candidates appearing, by reaſon that employment was generally diſliked, young Scipio, the ſon of the deceaſed proconſul, courageouſly offered himſelf for that hazardous enterprize. He was then but twenty-four years of age; and nevertheleſs, not only all the centuries, but every voter in each century, declared him proconſul of Spain [s]. He embarqued ſoon after at Oſtia with ten thouſand foot and a thouſand horſe, on board a fleet of thirty quinqueremes, and ſet out for his province.

[r] Idem ibid. c. 17.

Young Scipio choſen proconſul of Spain.

AND now the time for electing new magiſtrates drawing near, Fulvius Centumalus was recalled from Campania to preſide in the comitia. The perſons raiſed to the conſular dignity were Marcellus, the fourth time, who had lately taken the city of Syracuſe, and Lævinus, the ſecond time, who lay ſick at Anticyra in Greece, after having ſignalized himſelf againſt Philip of Macedon, as we have related in the reign of that prince. As ſoon as Lævinus arrived, both conſuls applied themſelves wholly to the preparations for the approaching campaign. Sicily fell to Lævinus, and Marcellus was ordered to march againſt Hannibal, who, ſince the reduction of Capua, was marched into Brutium. Marcellus began the campaign with the ſiege of Salapia in Apulia, which was betrayed to him by two leading men in the place. The Carthaginian garriſon, which conſiſted of five hundred brave Numidian horſe, ſeeing themſelves betrayed, reſolved to ſell their lives dear; and accordingly, quitting their horſes, fought on foot, and made a great ſlaughter of the enemy, till they were all cut in pieces, except fifty, who ſurrendered themſelves priſoners. From Apulia Marcellus marched into Samnium, where he recovered many cities, and took above three thouſand Carthaginian priſoners. But, in the mean time, the Romans received two very conſiderable checks; the one at Tarentum, where a ſquadron of ſhips, which they had ſent to ſupply the citadel with proviſions, was entirely defeated by the Tarentine fleet; the other in Apulia, where the proconſul Fulvius Centumalus was ſurpriſed by Hannibal, and cut off with eleven legionary tribunes and a great number of private men, ſome ſay thirteen thouſand, others only ſeven thouſand. However that be, this victory retrieved th

Salapia taken by Marcellus.

A Roman ſquadron defeat d by the Tarentine fleet.

[s] Polyb. l. x. c. 2.

the affairs and credit of Hannibal, and greatly diſcouraged the Roman ſenate and people, whoſe only hopes were now in Marcellus. This brave conſul was no ſooner informed of the defeat and death of Fulvius, than he marched in queſt of Hannibal, not doubting, as he wrote to the ſenate, but he ſhould ſoon damp the joy that ſwelled the mind of the proud conqueror. He came up with him near Numiſtro in Brutium, and, drawing up his men, offered him battle. The Carthaginian accepted the challenge; whereupon a bloody engagement enſued, which laſted the whole day, without any conſiderable advantage on either ſide. The next morning Marcellus marched out his army at ſun-riſing, and drew it up in the ſame place, where the battle had been fought the day before. But Hannibal not caring to hazard a ſecond engagement, kept his troops cloſe in their intrenchments, and decamped the night following. Marcellus purſued him from place to place; ſo that theſe two great generals ſpent the reſt of the campaign, the one watching for an opportunity to come to a general action, the other endeavouring to avoid it[t].

The progreſs of Scipio in Spain.

WHILE the Carthaginians were thus kept in awe by Marcellus in Italy, the arms of the republic in Spain proſpered beyond expectation under the conduct of young Scipio; who by the gracefulneſs of his perſon and his wonderful complaiſance, gained, on his firſt arrival, the hearts both of the Spaniards and Romans. The firſt time he reviewed his troops, he aſked for the brave Marcius, tenderly embracing him at the head of the army, heaped marks of diſtinction upon him, took him near his perſon, and was not aſhamed even to conſult him, and on ſeveral occaſions follow his advice. When the ſeaſon allowed him to take the field, he bent all his thoughts on the executing of a deſign, which he had formed before he left Rome. This deſign he now communicated to C. Lælius, the commander of his fleet, and his intimate and inſeparable friend; but carefully concealed it from all others. His ſcheme was to ſurpriſe New Carthage, the capital of the Carthaginian empire in Spain, where all the enemy's treaſures, machines of war, and naval ſtores were lodged. It was agreed, that Lælius ſhould ſhut up the port with his fleet, while Scipio inveſted the city by land. With this view the whole army paſſed the Iberus, and, marching always in the night, arrived

[t] Liv. l. xxvii. c. 2. Plut. in Marcell.

rived the ſeventh day early in the morning before New Carthage. Then he imparted his deſign both to the officers and ſoldiers, repreſented to them of what importance the reduction of that city would be with regard to the entire conqueſt of Spain, and told them, that Neptune had appeared to him, adviſed him to that enterpriſe, and promiſed him ſucceſs. He added, that they would ſoon ſee a miracle wrought by the god in their favour. He knew the hour when the tide would ebb, and leave the city acceſſible to his land-forces on the ſide of the port; and he made uſe of this natural event, which was a myſtery to the ſoldiers, to perſuade them, that he had a ſupernatural knowledge. Having thus encouraged his troops, as ſoon as the tide ebbed, Scipio, at the head of five hundred reſolute men, entered the baſon, having learnt from ſome fiſhermen, that it was fordable when the tide was out, and marching up to the waiſt through the water, ſcaled the walls, which on that ſide were very low, while the Carthaginians were wholly intent on repulſing the Romans, who attacked the city on the land-ſide. The confuſion of the beſieged was ſo great, when they ſaw the Romans within the walls, that they abandoned the ramparts, and gave the reſt of the army an opportunity of breaking down one of the gates and entering the city. Mago, who commanded in the town, retired with his garriſon, conſiſting of a thouſand regular troops and two thouſand of the inhabitants, to the citadel; but was ſoon obliged to ſurrender at diſcretion. The priſoners in all amounted to ſix thouſand men, beſides women, children, and ſlaves. The Africans were reduced to ſlavery; but the Spaniards were ſuffered to enjoy their eſtates and live according to their own laws, only in ſubjection to Rome. Eighteen galleys belonging to the enemy were taken in the port, and an hundred and thirteen merchant-ſhips loaded with naval-ſtores. In the granaries were found forty thouſand buſhels of wheat, and two hundred and ſixty thouſand buſhels of barley; and in the armories an immenſe quantity of warlike machines of all ſorts with ſeventy-four ſtandards. As the city was taken by aſſault, Scipio gave it up to be plundered by his ſoldiers, ordering them to bring all the booty into the market-place; where, upon taking an inventory of the whole, he found among other valuable effects two hundred and ſixty cups of gold, moſt of them weighing a pound, eighteen thouſand three hundred pounds weight of ſilver money, and a prodigious quantity of plate. All the braſs-money was diſtribu-

Scipio ſurpriſes New Carthage.

ted

ted among the ſoldiers, and the reſt of the rich ſpoils put into the hands of Caius Flaminius the quæſtor. The hoſtages likewiſe, whom the Carthaginians had demanded of the cities and provinces of Spain, were all found in the city, and ſent home by Scipio loaded with preſents. As for Mago and the other Carthaginian officers, they were put into the hands of Lælius, who treated them with great humanity [u].

AFTER this glorious day, the proconſul, leaving Lælius to command in the city, returned with his army to the camp, and ſpent the night there. The next morning, his officers, knowing that he was a great admirer of the fair ſex, brought to him a young virgin of extraordinary beauty. Where-ever ſhe appeared, ſhe charmed the eyes of all, and Scipio was ſtruck at the firſt ſight of her. But, though he was in the prime of his age, unmarried, and under no reſtraint, he did not ſuffer himſelf to be blinded by his riſing paſſion. He examined the beautiful captive concerning her country, birth, and engagements; and finding that ſhe was betrothed to a Celtiberian prince, named Allucius, he ordered both him and the captive's parents to be ſent for, and put her untouched into their hands, telling them, that the only return he expected from them was, their friendſhip for his republic. The young Spaniard was ſo tranſported with joy, that he could not ſo much as return Scipio thanks. As for the parents of the captive, they had brought a conſiderable ſum for the ranſom of their daughter, which they offered to the generous proconſul as a preſent, ſince he had freely given her to her lover without ranſom. They preſſed and entreated him to accept of it, and at length, throwing the money at his feet, retired. But Scipio immediately beſtowed it on Allucius, as an addition on his part to his wife's fortune. This behaviour, truly heroic, did the Roman republic more ſervice than even the taking of new Carthage. Allucius declared in Celtiberia, that the gods had ſent into Spain a young conqueror almoſt equal to themſelves. Upon his report Celtiberia came over to the Roman party; Allucius joined the Roman troops at the head of fourteen hundred choſen horſe, and all Spain began to revolt from the Carthaginians. And now Scipio diſpatched Lælius, and with him Mago and the ſenators of new Carthage, in a quinqueremis to Rome, to give the ſenate an account of his ſucceſs. Never was news received with more applauſe. The republic little expected to recover her affairs in Spain, and feared ſhe had hazarded too much in the hands of a young general. The ſenate therefore was overjoyed to find, that the very firſt enterpriſe of their young commander had eclipſed the glory both of his father and uncle. At the ſame time, the republic received from Sicily the agreeable news of the total reduction of that iſland by the conſul Lævinus, the particulars whereof we have related at length in our hiſtory of the city and kingdom of Syracuſe.

A remarkable inſtance of Scipio's continence.

[u] Liv. l. xxvi. c. 43. & ſeq. Polyb. l. x. c. 11. Appian. in Ibericis.

LÆVINUS, having ſettled affairs in Sicily, was recalled by the ſenate to hold the comitia. But he was ſcarce arrived, when he was ordered to return to his province upon certain intelligence, that the Carthaginians were fitting out a new fleet with a deſign to attempt the recovery of Sicily. He was commanded by the ſenate to name a dictator, before he left Rome, to preſide in the comitia for the new elections. But, as he inſiſted upon deferring the nomination till he was in Sicily, and it was not thought proper to interrupt Marcellus in his purſuit of Hannibal, the tribunes of the people took upon them to name a dictator in their aſſembly, viz. Fulvius Flaccus, the proconſul of Campania. Thus the conſuls loſt the prerogative, which they had enjoyed time out of mind, of appointing dictators. The dictator, having aſſembled the tribes, was himſelf named conſul with Fabius Maximus. Two of the tribunes oppoſed the election of Fulvius as contrary to law; but the ſenate, well pleaſed with the choice that had been made of two ſuch able commanders, declared, that the dictatorſhip did not by any means diſqualify Fulvius from being choſen conſul. In the mean time, Lælius arriving from Spain with Mago, the ſenators of New Carthage, and the rich booty which had been taken there, the ſenate, as a mark of diſtinction to Scipio, continued him in his commiſſion of proconſul of Spain, not for one year only, but till an order ſhould be made for recalling him.

The conſuls loſe the prerogative of appointing dictators.

AND now, the ſeaſon of the year being fit for action, the two conſuls left Rome. Fabius undertook the ſiege of Tarentum, while Fulvius on one ſide, and Marcellus on the other, watched the motions of Hannibal, intercepted his convoys, and prevented his men from going in parties to plunder at any diſtance from their camp. The Carthaginian, being thus haraſſed and reduced to great ſtreights for want of proviſions, reſolved at length to engage Marcellus, Tarentum beſieged by the Romans.

cellus, while the conſul Fulvius was at a great diſtance. Accordingly, having drawn up his men, and exhorted them to complete the work of Cannæ, he fell upon the Romans with incredible fury. After the engagement had laſted two hours with equal ſucceſs, the right wing of the Romans began to give way. Hereupon Marcellus ordered the eighteenth legion, which was poſted in the ſecond line, to advance into the firſt, and take the place of the body that began to retire; but as the legion advanced too ſlowly, and the troops, which they were to ſucceed, retreated with too much precipitation, the enemy laid hold of this opportunity to penetrate a great way into the Roman manipuli, and to put the whole right wing into diſorder. Marcellus ſtrove in vain to make them keep their ranks, and lead them back to the charge. They fled in the utmoſt confuſion, and their example was followed by the reſt of the army; ſo that Marcellus, now unſucceſsful for the firſt time, was obliged to return to his camp, leaving two thouſand ſeven hundred auxiliaries and Romans dead on the field of battle. Among theſe were two of his lieutenants, four centurions, and many perſons of diſtinction. Marcellus the ſame night aſſembled his troops, and, in a very angry ſpeech, reproached them with the bad ſucceſs of that melancholy action, which, he ſaid, was entirely owing to their cowardice. The ſoldiers readily owned their fault, and, aſking pardon for their ſudden flight, proteſted that they were ready to expoſe themſelves to any danger he ſhould think fit, with a firm reſolution either to die or conquer. Make ready then, replied the proconſul, to perform your promiſes to-morrow, and to deſerve the forgiveneſs you deſire. The next morning the legionaries were under arms, and ready to march by break of day. The manipuli, which had behaved ſo ſhamefully the day before, were placed, Plutarch ſays, at their own requeſt, in the firſt line, that they might have an opportunity of wiping off the ſhame of the day before. Marcellus, after his men had taken ſome nouriſhment, without letting their ardor cool, marched out of his camp, and drew up his army as uſual. Hannibal, ſurpriſed at this unexpected ſtep of the Roman general, cried out, What a ſtrange man is this Marcellus! whether conqueror, or conquered, he is always ready to fight. Let us march out, and teach him not to inſult, but to fear and reſpect his conquerors. Having thus ſpoke, he gave orders for the battle; the trumpets ſounded, and the attack began. The victory was for ſome hours diſputed with equal ſucceſs; but at length the Romans prevailed, and obliged the enemy to ſhelter themſelves in their camp. In this action Hannibal loſt eight thouſand of his beſt troops. However, Marcellus bought his victory dear; for three thouſand of his legionaries were killed upon the ſpot, and almoſt all the reſt wounded; ſo that he could not purſue Hannibal, who decamped the night after his defeat, retired into Brutium, and there intrenched himſelf, while Marcellus led his troops to Venuſia, to give them ſome reſpite and time to be cured [w].

Marcellus is routed by Hannibal.

But the next day gains a complete victory over them.

Tarentum reduced.

In the mean time, the conſul Fulvius recovered, without bloodſhed, the provinces of Lucania and Hirpinia, and great part of Brutium. As for Fabius, who had undertaken the reduction of Tarentum, he was put in poſſeſſion of that wealthy and important city, by the commander of the Brutian troops in garriſon there, who let the Romans into the place in the night-time. The Romans, ſeeing themſelves maſters of the place, ſpared neither Carthaginians, Tarentines, nor Brutians; nay, ſome writers tell us, that thoſe among the latter, who had been privy to the treachery of their leader, were by Fabius's orders maſſacred the firſt, leſt, if he ſpared them, this fine conqueſt ſhould be imputed more to treachery, than to his prudence and bravery. But this conduct is no-ways ſuitable to the character of that great man [x]. The riches found in this maritime city were immenſe. The quæſtors are ſaid to have received, for the public treaſury, eighty-ſeven thouſand pounds weight of gold, and three thouſand talents of ſilver. As to the pictures and ſtatues, Fabius, who had no taſte for arts and therefore neglected them, being aſked by the quæſtors, What he would have done with thoſe maſterpieces of painting and ſculpture? returned the following anſwer, which all the antients mention; Let us leave to the Tarentines their angry gods. He alluded to the attitudes, in which the gods of Tarentum were repreſented; for, after the Lacedæmonian manner, they were generally armed with ſwords and in fighting poſtures. As for the inhabitants, thirty thouſand citizens, who eſcaped the general maſſacre, were reduced to ſlavery, and ſold to the beſt bidder. In ſhort, the Tarentines were reduced to ſo low a ſtate, that they became a reproach among their neighbours, neighbours, and were employed, by Roman magiſtrates in the provinces, only as lictors and executioners [y]. As for Hannibal, upon the firſt news of the ſiege of Tarentum he had left Brutium, and haſtened to its relief. But when he was within five miles of the city, an account was brought him, that the Roman conſul had taken it by artifice. Upon which he cried out in great ſurprize; What! have the Romans then their Hannibal too! However, to ſave his honour, he did not immediately retire; but incamped on the place where he heard the news, and continued there ſome days. As Fabius did not offer to attack him, he marched at length to Metapontus, a city in his intereſt, and there contrived a ſtratagem, which had like to have proved fatal to Fabius. He ſent two of the inhabitants to the conſul with letters from the chief men of the city, offering to deliver up the place and the Carthaginian garriſon into his hands. Fabius, not ſuſpecting the cheat, fixed the day for his march, and would have fallen into an ambuſh prepared for him, had not the augurs and aruſpices, who doubtleſs were more ſuſpicious and had better intelligence than the general, detained him in the camp, by declaring that the preſages were all unfortunate. Hannibal, impatient of Fabius's delays, ſent new emiſſaries; but theſe, being arreſted and threatened with ſevere puniſhments, confeſſed the ſecret [z].

[w] Liv. l. xxvii. c. 12---15. Appian. in Hannibal. Plut. in Marcell. [x] Vide Plut. in Fab.

In Spain, Scipio, having fortified New Carthage and left a ſtrong garriſon in it, marched to Tarracon, where he ſpent the winter in exerciſing his troops, and teaching them the exacteſt diſcipline. Early in the ſpring he took the field, and as the Carthaginian forces were ſtill divided into three bodies under three generals, he marched to attack Aſdrubal, the brother of Hannibal, who was the neareſt to him, and whoſe army conſiſted almoſt wholly of Spaniards, except the Numidians Maſiniſſa had brought with him from Africa. The Carthaginian at his approach was much perplexed, not knowing what courſe to take. But at length he reſolved to hazard a battle, intending, if it proved unſucceſsful, to make the beſt of his way to the Pyrenees, and, croſſing Gaul, enter Italy. He poſted himſelf on an eminence in the midſt of a plain watered by a river, which, winding round the eminence, made it a peninſula. This was a very advantageous poſt; but Scipio, after two days days conſideration, reſolved to attack him before he was joined by the other Aſdrubal and Mago. He ſucceeded in the attempt; the enemy was entirely routed; and Aſdrubal, accompanied by Maſiniſſa, fled towards the Pyrenees, with as many troops and elephants as he could get together. The fame of this memorable action brought many of the petty princes of Spain to the Roman camp, and induced all the nations beyond the Iberus to renounce the Carthaginian party with great ſincerity. While Scipio continued in the camp of Aſdrubal, the quæſtor brought to him a youth, named Maſſiva, who had been found among the captives, and, by his comelineſs and an air of grandeur in his deportment, ſeemed to be of noble extraction. The proconſul, finding, upon examining him, that he was a nephew of Maſiniſſa, ordered him to be treated according to his rank; and when he had finiſhed ſome other affairs, he ſent for the young prince, and aſked him, whether he deſired to return to his uncle? Maſſiva anſwered with tears in his eyes, that this was the utmoſt of his wiſhes. Upon this the proconſul, having ordered him to be richly dreſſed, preſented him with a horſe finely accoutred, and in this manner ſent him back under a guard. Theſe were the methods by which Scipio gained the affections even of his enemies. The flight of Aſdrubal towards the Pyrenees gave the proconſul no ſmall uneaſineſs; however, he would not purſue him, but choſe rather to lead his victorious army into the heart of the country, and fix the ſeveral nations in an alliance with his republic. As to the Carthaginian generals, they joined their armies, and having conſulted together about the beſt meaſures to be taken, it was reſolved, that the ſon of Giſco ſhould reſign his troops to Mago, and repair to the Balearic iſlands to make new levies there, that Mago ſhould poſt himſelf in Luſitania, and that Aſdrubal ſhould march for Italy, and there join his brother with as many Spaniſh troops as he could get together [a].

Further progreſs of Scipio in Spain.

[y] Liv. ibid. Plut. in Fab. Aul. Gell. l. x. c. 3.

[z] Liv. l. xxvii. c. 16. Cic. de ſenec. Plut. in Fab.

Aſdrubal entirely defeated.

In Italy, the time for the new elections drawing near, Fulvius was recalled to preſide in the comitia, when Marcellus was choſen the fifth time, and with him T. Quinctius Criſpinus the ſecond time. The new conſuls no ſooner entered upon their office, than they took the field, and, uniting their forces, formed a deſign of making themſelves maſters of Locri, a ſtrong city in the intereſt of Hannibal. With this view they ordered a body of troops thither, which was

[a] Liv. ibid. c. 19. Polyb. l. x. c. 37.

was encamped before Tarentum. But Hannibal, being informed by the Thurians of the march of this detachment, surprized them near the river Laiis, killed two thousand of them, and took twelve hundred prisoners. Hereupon the two consuls advanced against Hannibal, and, drawing up their forces, offered him battle, which he declined, waiting for an opportunity to deceive the enemy by some stratagem; wherein he succeeded at length even beyond his expectation. Between his camp and that of the Romans was a little hill very convenient for encampments, being well supplied with water. As it was nearest to Hannibal, the Romans were surprised that he had not taken possession of it at first; and murmured against their generals for not being so quick, as they would have them, to seize such an advantageous post. At length Marcellus, to comply with their importunity, proposed to his collegue to go with a guard of two hundred and twenty horse, and take a view of the eminence which seemed so inviting to the soldiery. Quinctius approving of the motion, the two consuls set out on an expedition, which would have better become a private centinel or an inferior officer, than the heads of the republic. Marcellus was so little apprehensive of danger, that he left orders with his army to decamp on the first signal, and advance to take possession of this new post. Hannibal had hid a detachment of Numidians in the cavities of the hill, and under the bushes which covered it. These, coming out of their ambush, surprised and surrounded the two consuls and their guards; so that they could neither retreat, nor gain the top of the eminence. Being overwhelmed with showers of darts, they fell with fury on those who cut off their retreat; and perhaps the two consuls would have made their way through the enemy, had they not been deserted by the cowardly Hetrurians, of whom their guard chiefly consisted. The Hetrurians having fled or laid down their arms at the first appearance of danger, the consuls were left with only five or six Roman officers and about forty soldiers. These brave men fought with great courage and resolution, and had already opened a passage, when Marcellus, being mortally wounded by a dart, fell from his horse and died. His collegue, though dangerously wounded in two places, and Marcellus the son of the deceased consul, then a legionary tribune, behaved themselves so valiantly, that, with the assistance of their small guard, they returned, in spite of all opposition, to the camp. Thus died the renowned Marcellus

Hannibal gains an advantage over the Romans.

Marcellus is slain, and the other consul mortally wounded.

cellus, ſurnamed The ſword of the republic, a man famou for many victories, the terror of Hannibal, and the conqueror of Syracuſe. Though antiquity has taxed his prudence as a general, on account of this laſt raſh attempt; yet it is certain, that on all other occaſions he diſplayed the accompliſhed hero. Hannibal, upon the news of his death, flew to the place, where the body of his rival lay; and at the ſight of it ſhewed no marks of joy, but ſeemed rather to pity the misfortune of ſo great a man, in loſing his life in a manner unworthy of ſo renowned a commander. His firſt care was to take off the ring which the dead conſul had on his finger, and with which he ſealed his diſpatches, not doubting, but he ſhould have ſome opportunity or other of making uſe of it to his advantage. Then, having for ſome time admired the ſtature and noble mien of the deceaſed, he ordered the body to be wrapt up in a rich ſtuff, laid on a funeral pile, and burnt. He gathered up the aſhes, incloſed them in a ſilver urn, on which he placed a crown of gold and another of laurel, and in this pompous manner ſent the remains of the father to the ſon, who ſhewed them all thoſe marks of diſtinction which the illuſtrious father deſerved [b]. Livy, without mentioning any of theſe circumſtances, only tells us, that the body of the deceaſed conſul was buried by the Carthaginian general [c]. The ſurviving conſul, being dangerouſly wounded, decamped the following night, and poſted himſelf among inacceſſible mountains, and from his aſylum diſpatched meſſengers to all the neighbouring cities in the intereſt of Rome, acquainting them that Marcellus was killed, leſt Hannibal, who was maſter of his ring, ſhould attempt to deceive them by letters ſent to them in his name. This precaution preſerved Salapia in Apulia. Nay, the inhabitants turned the artifice of the Carthaginian upon himſelf: for a Roman deſerter having brought them a letter, as from the deceaſed conſul, acquainting them, that he would be there the next day, and ordering them to make the neceſſary preparations for his reception, the Salapians admitted ſix hundred of Hannibal's men, moſt of them Roman deſerters, into the town, and then all on a ſudden pulling up the draw-bridges, cut in pieces thoſe who had entered, and with a ſhower of darts from the ramparts, drove back the reſt. Hannibal, being thus diſappointed in his attempt upon Salapia, marched with all his forces to the relief of Locri, [b] Plut. in Marcell. [c] Liv. ibid.

Locri, which the Romans had cloſely inveſted by ſea and land. Upon his approach the Romans were ſo terrified, that Cincius, the admiral of the fleet, immediately ſounded a retreat, and, having embarqued all the land-forces on board his gallies, ſailed away, and returned to Rome. In the mean time, the conſul Quinctius, having left his poſt among the mountains, came and encamped near Capua, whence he ſent letters to the ſenate, acquainting them with the death of his collegue, and deſiring them to depute to him three men of prudence and integrity, with whom he might confer about the proper meaſures to be taken by the republic, ſince, his wounds proving mortal, he was drawing near his end. Accordingly, three ſenators were commiſſioned to receive his laſt advice; and at their requeſt he appointed a dictator to hold the comitia for the next elections. The perſon he choſe was T. Manlius Torquatus, who named C. Servilius for his general of the horſe. Soon after the conſul died. However, the Romans were a little comforted for the loſs of both their conſuls, with news from Sicily, that Lævinus, who commanded a fleet of an hundred ſail, had made a deſcent on Africa, brought from thence an immenſe booty, and afterwards defeated a Carthaginian fleet off Clypea [d].

The Romans are forced to raiſe the ſiege of Locri.

T. Manlius Torquatus dictator.

To retrieve the affairs of the republic, it was neceſſary, that two men of unexceptionable prudence and bravery ſhould be raiſed to the conſulate. The ſenate therefore caſt their eyes on Claudius Nero and M. Livius Salinator. The former was a man of uncommon bravery, but bold and enterpriſing, the latter more ſedate and calm, and therefore fit to temper the vivacity of his collegue. Livius had diſcharged the office of conſul twelve years before with great prudence; but, being unjuſtly cenſured by the people for a pretended unequal diviſion of the ſpoils of Illyricum, he had out of pique, retired to a country-houſe, and there, letting his hair and beard grow, lived like a man in diſgrace, till the cenſors obliged him to ſhave himſelf, and take his place in the ſenate; and even then he ſtill ſhewed his reſentment, giving his opinion by a yes or a no. As he was a man of unqueſtionable abilities, both the ſenate and the dictator thought him a proper perſon to be joined with Nero. But it was with the utmoſt difficulty, that they prevailed upon him to accept the dignity offered him. It fell to his lot to march againſt Aſdrubal, who was making the

[d] Liv. l. xxvii. c. 28. Appian. in Hannibalic. Plut. in Marcell.

the beſt of his way over the Alps into Italy to join his brother, and to Nero's lot to act againſt Hannibal in Brutium. Levies were raiſed with great rigor, and the Volones, formerly diſciplined by Sempronius, were obliged to ſerve again. Beſides the forces raiſed in Italy, Scipio ſent from Spain to Livius two thouſand legionaries, eight thouſand Spaniards and Gauls, and about two thouſand horſe, partly Numidians and partly Spaniards. Early in the ſpring the two conſuls took the field. Nero, at the head of forty thouſand foot and two thouſand five hundred horſe, encamped within five hundred paces of Hannibal's army; and having privately ſent a conſiderable detachment to fall upon the enemy in the rear from the eminences behind them, gained by this ſtratagem a victory, killed eight thouſand of the enemy, and took ſeven thouſand priſoners, with the loſs only of five hundred men. After this defeat Hannibal decamped in the night from the neighbourhood of Grumentum in Lucania, where the battle was fought. But the Romans purſued him with ſo much expedition, that they came up with him near Venuſia, and in another battle killed two thouſand of his men; which obliged him to make the beſt of his way to Metapontus, in order to join Hanno, whom he had ſent to make new levies in Brutium [e].

Hannibal defeated by the conſul Nero.

WHILE the conſul was thus purſuing and haraſſing Hannibal, a courier fell into the hands of the Romans with letters from Aſdrubal to his brother, importing, that he had paſſed the Alps, and that he was repairing to Umbria, in hopes that Hannibal would join him there. Upon this intelligence, the conſul Nero, having appointed one of his lieutenants to command the army, ſet out in the night with ſix thouſand of his choiceſt troops, cauſing a report to be ſpread, that he was going to attack a Carthaginian garriſon in a neighbouring city of Lucania. But his true deſign, which he diſcloſed to no-body, was to join his colleague, and give Aſdrubal battle, before his brother could come to his aſſiſtance. With this view he took the road to Picenum, and advanced with incredible expedition towards Ciſalpine Gaul, his ſoldiers, to whom he imparted his deſign, when he was got to a conſiderable diſtance from his camp, marching night and day at a great rate. At length he drew near his collegue's camp, and entered it in the night to conceal his arrival from the enemy. A council of war was held, in which it was resolved to give the enemy battle without delay. But Asdrubal, perceiving that the Romans were reinforced, decamped in the night, and after a long and tedious march came to the Metaurus, a river in Umbria, but postponed the passing of it till day-break. In the mean time, the Romans overtaking him, obliged him to give battle in a disadvantageous situation, and when his men were quite spent with hunger and want of rest. The consuls gained a complete victory, killed about fifty-six thousand of the enemy on the spot, and took a great many prisoners. As for Asdrubal himself, as soon as he saw the total defeat of his army, he threw himself into the midst of a Roman battalion, and died fighting. The Romans are said by some writers to have lost eight thousand men in this action; but others reduce them only to two thousand. The consul Nero after this glorious victory did not continue so much as one whole night in his collegue's camp; but, having cut off Asdrubal's head and taken it with him, he returned with such expedition, that in six days time he reached his camp at Canusium. On his return he sent some of the natives of Carthage, whom he had taken prisoners in the late battle, to Hannibal's camp in chains, that they might publish the victory there. At the same time, he ordered Asdrubal's head to be thrown into the enemy's trenches, or, as some say, to be fixed on a pole near them. This sight, with the report of the captives, filled Hannibal with horror and sadness. He is said in the height of his grief to have cried out, O Carthage; unhappy Carthage! I am sinking under the pressure of thy fate; and then he immediately decamped and retired into Brutium [f].

cil

[e] Liv. l. xxvii. c. 35.

Asdrubal defeated and slain.

The republic for a whole year had received no account of any new exploits in Spain. But now, to add to her joy, Lucius Scipio, the brother of the proconsul, arrived at Rome, and brought news, that Silanus, the proprætor under Scipio, had, with a detachment of ten thousand foot and five hundred horse, routed the united forces of Mago and Hanno; that he himself with another detachment had besieged and taken Aurinx, a city of importance on the confines of Lower Bœtica; and, lastly, that Asdrubal, the son of Gisco, to whom Mago had fled after his defeat, was confined to a corner of Spain near the streights of Gades.

Advantages gained by Scipio in Spain.

[f] Liv. l. xxvii. c. 46---51. Polyb. l. xi. c. 1. Appian. in Hannibal. Oros. l. iv. Zonar. l. ix. c. 9.

Gades. Lucius Scipio, who brought this news, came to Rome, attended by Hanno and many other Carthaginians of diſtinction taken in the war. Thus was the proſperity of the Romans completed in this happy year [g].

THE next year the new conſuls, Q. Cæcilius Metellus and L. Veturius Philo, carried on the war jointly in Brutium againſt Hannibal, who, though his troops were in a manner ſtarving, and in want of the common neceſſaries of life, with which Brutium could not ſupply them, gained notwithſtanding ſome advantage over the conſuls in the plains of Coſentia, where he continued encamped the reſt of the ſummer, the conſuls not daring to attack him. But, while Hannibal was upon the defenſive in Italy, Scipio gave the Carthaginians no reſpite in Spain. He marched at the head of forty thouſand foot and three thouſand horſe, againſt the united forces of Mago and Aſdrubal, conſiſting of ſeventy thouſand foot and four thouſand five hundred horſe, engaged them in a large plain near Bœcula, on the confines of Bœtica, and gained a complete victory over them. The Carthaginians indeed behaved with extraordinary valour, and made ſuch a reſolute reſiſtance, as almoſt diſheartened the Romans; inſomuch, that Scipio was forced to diſmount, ſeize a buckler, and throw himſelf ſword in hand into the midſt of the African battalions, before he could engage his men to make the neceſſary efforts to decide the day in their favour. Aſdrubal fled to his camp, but abandoned it in the night and retired towards the ſea. Scipio purſued him cloſe, and coming up with him, made a ſecond furious havock of his men; inſomuch, that of his vaſt army only ſix thouſand were left about him, the Carthaginians being for the moſt part killed, and the Spaniards returned after the firſt battle to their reſpective countries. With theſe ſmall remains of ſo numerous an army, the three chiefs, Aſdrubal, Mago, and Maſiniſſa, gained the ſummit of a ſteep hill, and there intrenched themſelves as well as they could. As the ſea was near, firſt Aſdrubal, and afterwards Mago, eſcaped in the night by a ſhameful flight, and finding ſhips ready to ſail, embarqued for Gades, leaving their men to ſhift for themſelves. Maſiniſſa continued on the hill, where he was inveſted by Silanus, whom Scipio left there with a detachment, while he himſelf returned to Tarracon. A few days after the departure of the proconſul, Silanus had a private interview with Maſiniſſa; and Scipio gains a complete victory over the Carthaginians in Spain.

[g] Liv. l. xxviii. c. 1.

and though we know not the conditions of the engagement, into which the Numidian king entered with Rome, it is certain he bound himſelf by ſuch ties as proved indiſſoluble. The effects of his good underſtanding with Silanus immediately appeared, the troops he commanded on the rock being allowed to diſperſe, and he to return into his own dominions, where he took proper meaſures to ſupport the party he had newly embraced [h].

SPAIN being now almoſt totally reduced, Scipio ſent Lælius into Africa to negotiate an alliance with Syphax, king of Maſæſylia, who had eſpouſed the Carthaginian party. As Lælius was only a ſubaltern in Scipio's army, the king, for his greater ſecurity, inſiſted upon having a perſonal conference with the proconſul himſelf. Hereupon Scipio, whoſe great ſoul was above the fear of danger, having left the brave Marcius at Tarracon with part of the army, and ſent Silanus with the reſt to New Carthage, embarqued with Lælius for Africa, and arrived at the capital of king Syphax. As the fugitive Aſdrubal happened to arrive there at the ſame time, the Numidian king would fain have had Scipio enter into a conference with the Carthaginian, in order to an amicable accommodation. But the proconſul excuſed himſelf, as not having received any commiſſion to treat of peace. However, he accepted the invitation to dine at the king's table with Aſdrubal; on which occaſion he appeared as much ſuperior to his rival in the charms of converſation, as he had been in war. Syphax was ſo taken with his eloquence, addreſs, and noble behaviour, that he entered into a ſecret treaty with him, amuſing the Carthaginian, who had a fleet there, till the proconſul was ſafely arrived at New Carthage. Upon his return he marched in perſon to beſiege Illiturgis, and ſent Marcius to reduce Caſtulo; both which cities had revolted from the Romans. The former being taken by aſſault, all the inhabitants, without diſtinction of ſex or age, were put to the ſword, and the city razed. The latter capitulated, and was more favourably treated. Marcius in the next place appeared before Aſtapa, the inhabitants of which city, obſtinately devoted to the Carthaginians, ſallied out in good order to attack the Romans, and all died fighting, except fifty, who had been left in the city to guard their effects, their wives Scipio paſſes over into Africa to treat with king Syphax.

Illiturgis, Caſtulo, and Aſtapa taken by the Romans.

[h] Liv. l. xxviii. c. 15, & ſeq. Appian. in Ibericis. Polyb. l. xi. c. 21.

wives and children, whom they had brought into the market-place deſigning to deſtroy them all with fire and ſword, in caſe the Romans ſhould prevail. This truſt they diſcharged upon the firſt news of the defeat of their countrymen, ſetting fire to a great pile, on the top of which they had placed the women, children, and their moſt valuable moveables. This done, they threw themſelves into the flames, leaving the Romans maſters of an empty city. While Marcius was thus executing vengeance on the rebellious cities, Scipio was returned to New Carthage, where he fell dangerouſly ſick; and a report being ſpread that he was dead, not only Indibilis and Mandonius, two petty kings mentioned above, immediately revolted from the Romans; but eight thouſand legionaries, who were encamped on the banks of the Sucro, mutinied, drove away their leaders, and choſe two common ſoldiers, Atrius and Albius, to conduct them. Theſe fellows, ſeeing themſelves at the head of eight thouſand Roman legionaries, had the inſolence to uſurp the conſular dignity, and to order lictors to march before them. The pretence for the mutiny was their not having received pay for ſix months. But, in the mean time, the proconſul, having recovered his health, and by a ſtratagem ſecured the ring-leaders of the revolt, cauſed their heads to be ſtruck off; which ſo terrified the reſt, that they all returned to their duty, and took a new military oath. As to the Spaniſh princes, who had revolted, Scipio was informed, that they had raiſed an army of twenty thouſand foot and two thouſand five hundred horſe, and that they were living upon free quarter in the territories of the friends of Rome. Hereupon he marched againſt them, and coming up with them in the country of the Sedetani, gained there a complete victory, ſeventeen thouſand Spaniards being killed upon the ſpot. After this defeat, the two kings had no reſource, but in the clemency of the conqueror, who contented himſelf with obliging them to ſupply him with money enough to pay his troops. After this the proconſul marched with part of his troops towards Gades, the only city of Spain in the Carthaginian intereſt. His chief deſign in this journey was, to have an opportunity of conferring with Maſiniſſa, who had ſhut himſelf up in that city with Mago, and was impatient to have a conference with the Roman general. Accordingly the Numidian prince, under pretence of going out to forage, met Scipio, and entered into an alliance with Rome, adviſing the proconſul to paſs over into Africa, and lay ſiege to Carthage

A mutiny in Scipio's army.

The Spaniſh rebels defeated.

Maſiniſſa confers privately with Scipio, and enters into an alliance with Rome.

Carthage itself, which, he said, would be easily reduced. The treaty being concluded, the proconsul returned to Tarracon, and Masinissa to Gades, after having pillaged some part of the continent to conceal the true design of his journey. Soon after Mago received orders to leave Gades, and hasten with all his forces to the assistance of Hannibal in Italy. Upon his departure, the Gaditani immediately submitted to the Romans, who were now become masters of all Spain. As Mago was coasting along Spain in his way to Italy, he formed a rash design of surprising New Carthage; but lost in the attempt eight thousand men; which misfortune obliged him to stop at the Balearic islands, where he forced ten thousand of the inhabitants into the service of his republic, and did not sail from those islands for Italy till the spring. At Rome, the senate no sooner received an account of the entire reduction of Spain, but they determined to recal Scipio; and accordingly, without giving him time to enjoy any rest after his fatigues, or even waiting for the new comitia, they dispatched two persons to succeed him, Cornelius Lentulus and Manlius Acidinus; the former was to govern the Hither Spain, from the Pyrenees to the Sucro, and the latter the Further Spain, from the Sucro to the Ocean. To these Scipio surrendered the fasces without murmuring, and, attended by his faithful Lælius and his brother Lucius, immediately set sail with a squadron of ten ships, and returned to Italy [i].

Scipio, having reduced all Spain, is recalled.

As Scipio arrived at Rome about the time of the new elections, it is not to be expressed with what zeal the centuries gave their suffrages in his favour, though he had not yet attained to the years customarily required for the consular dignity, being only between twenty-eight and twenty-nine years of age. The collegue appointed him was P. Licinius Crassus, surnamed Dives, and at this time pontifex maximus. When the fathers came to settle the provinces of the new consuls, Scipio desired to be sent into Africa. But old Fabius, now president of the senate, in a long and studied speech, laboured to set forth the dangers of such an enterprise. It was very visible, that jealousy of a rising merit, which already began to eclipse his own, was what chiefly animated Fabius at this time; and Scipio in his answer did not fail to expose this infirmity of the old president. After long and warm debates, the affair of the provinces of the two consuls was put to the vote, when it was decreed, that Scipio should command in Sicily, and that, if he thought it for the advantage of the republic, he might, with the fleet there, consisting only of thirty ships of war, pass over into Africa. As for Licinius, he was directed to carry on the war against Hannibal in Brutium. Scipio, whose thoughts were wholly bent on Africa, notwithstanding his collegue, at the persuasion of Fabius, did all he could to obstruct his measures, obtained leave to take with him into Sicily as many voluntiers as he could get together, and a power to ask of the allies all things necessary for building and equipping a new fleet. Many of the provinces and cities voluntarily taxed themselves to furnish him with corn, iron, timber, cloth for sails, &c. so that in forty days time after the cutting of the timber, he was in a condition to set sail, with a fleet of thirty new galleys and about seven thousand voluntiers [k].

Scipio is chosen consul.

[i] Liv. l. xxviii. c. 24. & seq. Appian. in Ibericis. Zonar. l. ix. c. 10, 11.

And sent into Sicily.

Mago, the brother of Hannibal, lands with an army in Italy.

In the mean time, news was brought to Rome, that Mago, the brother of Hannibal, had landed in Liguria with twelve thousand foot and two thousand horse, and that his army was, soon after his landing, greatly swelled by the Gauls and Ligurians, who flocked to him from all parts. At the same time, the consul Licinius sent the senate an account, that the plague raged in his camp and obliged him to continue inactive. But, as Hannibal's troops were affected with the same distemper, and had also a famine to struggle with, eighty ships, loaded with provisions for him and his brother Mago, having been lately taken by a Roman squadron, the fears of the people were entirely quieted [l].

During this inaction in Italy, Scipio, having disciplined the voluntiers he had brought with him into Sicily, sent Lælius with the choicest of them on board a fleet of thirty galleys, to make a descent in Africa and pillage the country. Lælius landed near Hippo, laid the territory about it waste, and threw the people of Carthage into the utmost consternation. Masiniss was no sooner informed of the arrival of Lælius, than he went to confer with him; and expressed his surprize, that Scipio so long delayed his departure from Sicily, since there could never be a more favourable opportunity of attacking Carthage, which was destitute both of men and provisions. The Numidian promised to join join Scipio, the moment he arrived, with all his forces; but adviſed Lælius to embarque his troops, and return without delay, ſince the Carthaginian fleet was getting ready to intercept him. Lælius followed his advice, and, weighing anchor the next day, arrived ſafe in Sicily with an immenſe booty. In the mean time, Mago in Liguria received from Carthage a reinforcement of ſix thouſand men, with vaſt ſums for raiſing troops in Ciſalpine Gaul. But, notwithſtanding all he could do, Livius and Lucretius, who commanded two Roman armies in the neighbourhood of Ariminum, took their meaſures ſo well, that he was forced to continue in Liguria, though he had been ordered by his republic to join his brother in Brutium [m].

Lælius makes a descent in Africa.

[k] Liv. l. xxviii. c. 43, & seq. Plut. in Fab.

[l] Liv. ibid. c. 45.

In the mean time, Scipio, having ſurprized the city of Locri, which ſtood on the ſea-coaſt near Sicily, and left Pleminius governor of the place, returned to the ſaid iſland, and there went on with the preparations for his African expedition, hoping, that, at leaſt the next year, the republic would ſuffer him to carry the war into the neighbourhood of Carthage. In Spain, Mandonius and Indibilis, deſpiſing the new proconſuls, revolted from the Romans; but were entirely defeated in a pitched battle, thirteen thouſand of the Spaniards being killed on the ſpot, among whom was Indibilis himſelf, and eight thouſand taken priſoners. After this defeat, the Spaniards ſeized Mandonius with the other heads of the revolt, and ſent them under a ſtrong guard to the camp of the proconſuls Lentulus and Acidinus, who had inſiſted on this as a condition of their obtaining mercy. In Italy, the plague made a dreadful havock in the camp of the conſul Licinius, as well as in that of the enemy; ſo that nothing was attempted on either ſide during this campaign. Licinius not being in a condition to return to Rome, named Cæcilius, the proconſul in Brutium, to hold the comitia for the new elections. M. Cornelius Cethegus and P. Sempronius Tuditanus were choſen conſuls. The latter was then in Greece, and, before he left that country, he entered into a treaty of peace with Philip king of Macedon, which was confirmed by the ſenate. Licinius in quality of proconſul was ordered to continue the war againſt Hannibal, Livius to watch Mago in Ciſalpine Gaul, and Scipio to remain in Sicily. The latter was allowed to paſs over into Africa, and to chuſe ſuch of the Roman troops in Sicily as he thought fit for that enterpriſe. We have obſerved above, that Scipio had gained over to the Roman intereſt the two Numidian kings, Syphax and Maſiniſſa. On the other hand, Aſdrubal, the ſon of Giſco, undertook to draw off one of them at leaſt, by means of his daughter Sophoniſba, who is repreſented by hiſtorians as a woman of extraordinary beauty, ſublime genius, engaging manner, and of a courage above her ſex. Her father, to gain Maſiniſſa, had promiſed her in marriage to him; but, that prince being afterwards unfortunately diſpoſſeſſed of the throne of his anceſtors, Aſdrubal broke his word, and gave her to Syphax, who, forgetting his engagements with Scipio, entered into an alliance with Carthage. However, to keep ſome meaſures with Rome, he wrote to Scipio, acquainting him with his marriage, the new alliance he had made with the Carthaginians, and the neceſſity he was under of taking part with them, in caſe they were attacked. The proconſul received this letter with ſome ſurpriſe; but, concealing the contents of it from his army, he aſſembled his troops, and told them, that both Maſiniſſa and Syphax complained of his dilatorineſs, and preſſed him not to delay his departure, ſince they were ready to join him with all their forces; he then ordered his fleet to the port of Lilybæum, and commanded his troops to repair thither by land. It is not certain what number of men Scipio embarqued; but never was embarquation made with more order and ſolemnity. The concourſe of people who came from all parts to ſee him ſet ſail and wiſh him a proſperous voyage, was prodigious. Juſt before he weighed anchor, he appeared on the poop of his galley, and, after a herald had proclaimed ſilence, addreſſed a ſolemn prayer to the gods; which ended, he ordered a victim to be ſlain, threw the entrails into the ſea, and then, the trumpets ſounding, he weighed anchor, ſailed out of the harbour with a favourable wind, and, arriving ſafe on the coaſt of Africa, landed at the Fair Promontory, where we ſhall leave him a while to return to the affairs of Italy.

The Spaniſh rebels entirely defeated.

[m] Liv. l. xxix. c. 4.

Sophoniſba is given in marriage to Syphax, who enters into an alliance with Carthage.

Scipio embarques for Africa.

THE conſul Sempronius no ſooner arrived in his province, but he marched towards Croton, where Hannibal was encamped. The Carthaginian met him unexpectedly on his march, and having forced him to fight before he could draw up his men, killed twelve hundred Romans, and obliged the reſt to retire in diſorder. The conſul encamped at ſome diſtance from the enemy, and reſolved to hazard a ſecond battle, when joined by the proconſul Licinius, who was not far off. Accordingly, he was no ſooner reinforced reinforced by the proconsular army, but he marched out of his intrenchments, and bid the enemy defiance. Hannibal was too proud of his late victory not to accept the challenge. The victory was long doubtful; but in the end the Romans prevailed, killed four thousand of the enemy on the spot, and took about three hundred prisoners and eleven standards. After this defeat Hannibal retired to Croton, and appeared no more in the field the whole campaign. But the consul Sempronius, taking advantage of the enemy's inaction, made himself master of Petilia, Clampetia, Cosentia, and Pandosia; and then returned to Rome to erect a temple to Fortune, which he had vowed before the last battle, in case it proved successful. On the other hand, the consul Cethegus, who acted against Mago, kept Hetruria and Cisalpine Gaul in awe; so that the Carthaginian, who was not in a condition to force the Roman intrenchments, gave over all thoughts of joining his brother this campaign[n].

Hannibal gains ſome advantage over the conſul Sempronius.

But is afterwards defeated by him.

Several cities in Bruttium taken by the Romans.

DURING these transactions in Italy, Scipio, as we have observed above, arrived safe on the coast of Africa. The alarm and terror, which this unexpected descent caused at Carthage, is not to be expressed. The republic had no general to make head against Scipio, except Asdrubal, the son of Gisco, who was not a match for him; nor was she provided with any regular and disciplined troops. Scipio, having ordered his fleet to Utica, encamped with his land-forces on certain eminences at a small distance from the coast, and from thence sent out a detachment of five hundred men to forage. These were attacked by a flying party under the command of Hanno, a young warrior, who had been ordered to observe the enemy's motions. The Romans had all the advantage, and the young Carthaginian was killed in the engagement. Scipio, looking upon this first success as a good augury, immediately drew near to Locha, a city which seemed to promise his soldiers a rich booty. But he had no sooner planted his scaling-ladders for the assault, than the inhabitants sent a herald to demand their lives with liberty to retire. Upon this Scipio sounded a retreat; but the greedy soldiers carried on the assault, scaled the walls, and, entering the city, put all, even women and children, to the sword. But so barbarous an action and so signal a disobedience did not escape unpunished. The centurions, who had encouraged the soldiers to carry on the attack, were ordered to draw lots which of them ſhould die. Three of them were executed, and the guilty ſoldiers were deprived of the booty they had taken °.

Scipio arrives in Africa.

Hanno defeated and Locha taken

[n] Liv. l. xxix. c. 27--36. Appian, ibid.

AFTER this expedition, Maſiniſſa came privately in the night to confer with Scipio. He had been deprived of his kingdom by Syphax, and reſtored to it by the mediation of the Carthaginians, who readily embraced that opportunity of obliging a prince, whoſe bravery and enterpriſing genius gave them no ſmall umbrage. However, Syphax detained Maſiniſſa's mother, whom he had taken priſoner, as a hoſtage to ſecure her ſon's fidelity. Maſiniſſa was ſenſible, that the Carthaginians were not ſincere at the bottom; and therefore he ſtill retained his former affection for Rome, tho', to comply with the times, he had joined Aſdrubal with a ſtrong reinforcement of horſe. In the private interview he had with Scipio, it was agreed, that the Numidian ſhould continue to deceive the credulous Carthaginians, till a favourable opportunity offered of breaking openly with them, and till he could free himſelf from the conſtraint he was under by the captivity of his mother. In the mean time, Aſdrubal, at the head of twenty thouſand foot and ſeven thouſand horſe, with an hundred and forty elephants, drew near to Utica, which Scipio was preparing to inveſt. Maſiniſſa, who was one of the council of war on all occaſions, perſuaded Aſdrubal to detach his ſon Hanno with a thouſand horſe to watch the motions of the enemy and attempt to enter Utica with that reinforcement, promiſing to favour the enterprize with all his Numidian cavalry. He then gave notice to Scipio of the deſign, who ſurpriſed the detachment and took Hanno priſoner. And now Maſiniſſa, not doubting but Aſdrubal would willingly exchange his mother for Hanno, joined the Romans with all his forces (R). As for Syphax, when he ſaw that his rival Maſiniſſa joins the Romans.

° Appian. in Punic.

(R) We have followed Appian in this matter; but Livy relates it in quite a different manner. According to him, Scipio had no ſooner landed his troops in Africa, than he advanced towards Utica, and encamped within a mile of that city. The Carthaginians, in order to ſtop the progreſs of the Roman army, had recourſe to Syphax, who was entirely governed by Aſdrubal, his father-in-law, and his new wife Sophoniſba. Aſdrubal, who was then at the court of king Syphax, was ordered to leave it, and haſten to the defence rival had declared for the Romans, he endeavoured firſt to draw him off from the party he had embraced; but not ſucceeding therein, he attempted to bribe one of his ſervants to poiſon him. This treachery was diſcovered; and then Syphax, who had hitherto taken upon himſelf the office of mediator between Rome and Carthage, and encamped apart with his army, which conſiſted of fifty thouſand foot and ten thouſand horſe, kept no longer any meaſures with the Romans. He led his troops before Tholus, a place where the Romans had a magazine of corn, ſurpriſed it, and put the garriſon to the ſword. In the mean time, Scipio was ſo haraſſed by the enemy, who ſurrounded him, that he was obliged to raiſe the ſiege of Utica, after he had continued it forty days, and retire as the winter approached, to a more commodious poſt. The place which he choſe was a promontory, under which his fleet was anchored. There he fortified his camp, and waited for the return of the ſpring to renew the war with vigor [P].

And Syphax the Carthaginians.

[P] Liv. l. xxix. c. 35. Appian. in Punic.

In defence of his country. Till he arrived, Hanno was appointed to watch the motions of the enemy, and ſecure the country againſt their incurſions. The Carthaginians, purſuant to his commiſſion, found means to draw together a body of four thouſand horſe; and with this ſmall army he took the road to Solera, and cantoned his troops in that neighbourhood, about fifteen miles from the Roman camp. Hereupon Scipio ordered Maſiniſſa, who, according to Livy, had already declared openly for the Romans, to march with a troop of Numidian horſe towards Solera, while he himſelf, at the head of a choice body of Roman horſe, followed him at ſome diſtance through by-ways among the hills, in order to conceal his approach from the enemy. Maſiniſſa, as had been concerted, advanced with his troop to the very gates of Solera, as it were to inſult Hanno, who had retired with his troops into that city. Hanno did not fail to ſally out againſt him; and then the Numidian king, returning in good order, drew the enemy by degrees into the plain, when Scipio, who lay in ambuſh among the rocks, ſtarting up, cut off their retreat, and ſurrounded them on all ſides. Two thouſand of the enemy were either killed or taken, and among the former was, according to Livy, Hanno himſelf, with ſeveral Carthaginians of diſtinction. This is the account Livy gives us of this action; but that of Appian ſeems to us to agree better with the precedent and ſubſequent events. Beſides, Cælius and Valerius, two antient annaliſts quoted by Livy himſelf, tell us, that Hanno was not killed, but taken priſoner: as does alſo Zonaras, whoſe authority is an additional weight to incline the balance in favour of Appian.

In the mean time, cloaths, corn, and proviſions of all ſorts were ſent from Rome to Scipio's army, in ſpite of the peeviſh jealouſy of old Fabius, who was ever inveighing againſt the proconful, and even moved in the ſenate to have him recalled. When the comitia had elected the new conſuls, Cn. Servilius Cæpio, and C. Servilius Geminus, and came to appoint the proconſuls, Scipio was honoured with a particular mark of diſtinction; for while the others were nominated only for one year, he was continued proconſul in Africa till the war was ended. The whole winter was ſpent in fruitleſs negotiations between Scipio and Syphax, who had aſſumed anew the quality of mediator. Early in the ſpring, the proconſul ſent a detachment to take poſſeſſion of the old poſt, where he had encamped when he beſieged Utica. Both the Romans and Africans imagined, that his intention was to renew that enterprize. But his deſign was to attack the two camps of the enemy in the night; for Syphax was encamped with his army apart from the Carthaginians. This ſcheme he imparted to his troops the night before the attack; and the motion being approved of by all, tho' there were more men in each camp than the whole of the Roman army, Scipio divided his troops, and gave the command of one part to Maſiniſſa and of another to Lælius, ordering them to inveſt the camp of Syphax on different ſides, and to ſet fire to their barracks, which were of wood, mats, hurdles, and ſuch combuſtible materials. As for himſelf, he told Maſiniſſa and Lælius, that he would watch the motions of Aſdrubal's army, but ſuſpend the attack of his intrenchments, till he received advice, that they had penetrated to the centre of the Numidian camp. The whole ſcheme was happily executed. The camp of Syphax firſt, and then that of Aſdrubal, was ſurpriſed and burnt. Many of the Carthaginians and Numidians were burnt alive in their beds, ſome were ſuffocated with the ſmoke, others ran to the gates, and were either ſtifled in the croud, or maſſacred by the enemy. Men, beaſts of burden, and elephants, all periſhed, either in the flames, or by the ſword. Thoſe who leaped down from the top of the ramparts, to avoid periſhing in the flames, were cut in pieces by parties of Roman troops, who had ſeized all the avenues to the two camps. The plain was all covered with dead bodies, and the two camps filled with heaps of aſhes and bones. Forty thouſand of the enemy were deſtroyed either by fire or ſword, and five thouſand made priſoners. Among the latter latter were many persons of distinction; particularly eleven Carthaginian senators. The Romans saved out of the flames a hundred and sixty standards, two thousand seven hundred Numidian horses, and six elephants. Scipio did not lose a hundred men in this decisive action. The two African commanders, Asdrubal and Syphax, found means to make their escape, with two thousand foot and five hundred horse. The consternation of the people at Carthage was inexpressibly great, when they saw Asdrubal arrive there, with the poor remains of his shattered army. The Suffetes, or supreme magistrates, immediately assembled the senators, who were divided in opinion, some being for recalling Hannibal without delay, others for proposing a truce with the enemy; but the Barcan faction, which was for pursuing the war and continuing Hannibal in Italy, prevailed. Hanno, the son of Hamilcar, was appointed to command the troops in the room of Asdrubal, who was sentenced to die for his ill conduct; but, the troops being for him, he avoided the execution of the sentence, and having assembled eight thousand foot and three thousand horse, he endeavoured to serve his country, without any commission from the republic. As for Syphax, he had retired, after his defeat, to Abba, or Obba, where he was soon joined by Asdrubal and other troops; so that the two African commanders found themselves in a very short time in a condition to appear anew in the field, having drawn together from several parts near thirty thousand men. With this army they encamped in a place called The Great Plain, about five days march from Utica, which Scipio had besieged anew. However, the proconsul was no sooner informed of their motions, than he turned the siege into a blockade, and hastened to attack them. After some slight skirmishes, the two armies came to a general engagement, in which the Romans prevailed, and gained a complete victory. After this success, the proconsul dispatched Lælius and Masiniſſa after Syphax, who, with the best part of his troops, hastened back into his own country. Scipio resolved to make himself in the mean time master of the towns in the neighbourhood of Carthage. With this view he marched to Tunis, from whence Carthage could be seen, and took it without the loss of a single man, the garrison having deserted it in a fright at his approach. The Carthaginians, in order to divert Scipio from laying siege to their capital, having equipped with incredible expedition a fleet of a hundred galleys, sent it, under the command of Hamilcar, the Hanno appointed commander of the Carthaginian forces.

Scipio ſurpriſes and burns the camps of Syphax and Aſdrubal.

Scipio gains a complete victory over Asdrubal and Syphax.

Tunis taken by Scipio.

the father of Hanno, to burn the Roman fleet, which lay under the promontory formerly mentioned. Scipio, perceiving from Tunis the courſe which the Carthaginians ſteered, made what haſte he could to preſerve his fleet; and reaching the port by land, before the enemy arrived there by ſea, drew up his galleys as near to the ſhore as he could, and repulſed the enemy, who, nevertheleſs took ſix of his galleys. With this ſmall prize Hamilcar returned to Carthage; and the proconſul thought it adviſeable to continue where he was, till he could receive from Italy a reinforcement of ſhips, his whole fleet conſiſting now but of fourteen galleys [q].

Syphax defeated, and taken priſoner.

In the mean time, Lælius and Maſiniſſa, who, with the third part of the legions, were gone in purſuit of Syphax, penetrated, after fifteen days march, into the heart of Numidia. Syphax, at the head of a very numerous army, advanced to meet them; but was vigorouſly repulſed in a general action which enſued, forced to fly, and purſued to the banks of a river, where Maſiniſſa himſelf took him priſoner, with his ſon Vermina. After this, the victorious Numidian, with the approbation of Lælius, who was to follow him by ſlow marches, haſtened to appear before Cyrtha, the capital of Syphax's dominions. As he had taken the captive king with him, the city, being deſtitute of all hopes of relief, readily ſurrendered. Maſiniſſa entered it in triumph, and haſtened to the palace, with full intention to puniſh Sophoniſba, for entering into engagements with his rival, after ſhe had been betrothed to him. But he was ſoon diſarmed; for he no ſooner entered the palace, than the beautiful queen, ſet off with all the charms of dreſs, fell at his feet, and, embracing his knees, conjured him in the moſt moving manner not to deliver her up to the Romans, but rather to free her by death from the chains of an inſulting enemy. Theſe words made a deep impreſſion on Maſiniſſa; he looked tenderly on her, and feeling his former flame revive, he reached out his hand to her; which was a token that her requeſt was granted. But as the fair captive properly belonged to Scipio, and Maſiniſſa, who was but a ſubaltern in the Roman army, had no right to make ſuch a promiſe, he was greatly perplexed to know how he ſhould perform it. At length he reſolved to follow the dictates of his love, and marry her, thinking that neither Scipio nor Lælius could lay any claim claim to her, after he had by a lawful marriage, made her his own. The public rejoicings on this occaſion were not over when Lælius arrived. He was ſo ſhocked at ſo precipitate a marriage, that he reſolved at firſt to ſnatch the queen from the nuptial bed, and ſend her away with the other captives to Scipio; but, upon ſecond thoughts, he determined to refer the matter to the judgment of the proconſul, and in the mean time let the prince enjoy his amours. As for Syphax, he was ſent under a ſtrong guard to Scipio's camp, where he was treated with great politeneſs and reſpect, the proconſul remembering the hoſpitable entertainment this prince had formerly given him at his court. As Scipio took frequently pleaſure in converſing with his royal captive, he learned of him, that, if he had been left to his own judgment, he would have continued faithful to Rome; but that his wife Sophoniſba, having by her irreſiſtible charms made herſelf miſtreſs of his heart, had induced him to prefer Carthage to Rome. Hereupon Scipio, fearing ſhe might gain ſuch an aſcendant over her new huſband, reſolved to take her from him. It was not long before Maſiniſſa, having reduced all Numidia, arrived at the proconſul's camp with his new queen. Scipio received him with all the marks of diſtinction, but took no notice of Sophoniſba, though ſhe entered his tent together with Maſiniſſa. From the proconſul's tent ſhe was conducted to Maſiniſſa's quarters, and there reſpected as his wife; but Scipio, by no means liking to ſee a Carthaginian woman with the title of queen in the midſt of a Roman army, had a private conference with Maſiniſſa a few days after his arrival. He complimented him in the firſt place on his heroic behaviour, and then expoſtulating with him on his late conduct, exhorted him to conquer the love of pleaſure, and not ſuffer himſelf to be enſlaved by a woman, after having ſubdued a vaſt kingdom. At the ſame time, he put him in mind, that the ſpoils and captives taken from the enemy belonged not to him, but to the Romans. He concluded his ſpeech thus: I am very ſenſible, that your heart trembles at the thought of the ſacrifice I require of you; but return, Maſiniſſa, return to your reaſon. Hitherto your weakneſs deſerves pity; but it may become unpardonable. Your perſeverance in it may be attended with a long repentance. The Numidian prince bluſhed and wept. His heart was rent with oppoſite paſſions; but at length his virtue and his intereſt gained the aſcendant over his love. He promiſed the general to ſhake off his chains; and ſo far got the maſtery over his paſſion, as to carry in perſon to his beloved Sophoniſba the decree, which Scipio had pronounced againſt her, declaring that ſhe belonged to the Roman people. When he entered his tent, Receive now, ſaid he, the laſt teſtimony of my affection and fidelity. It is abſolutely out of my power to deliver you from the ſlavery with which you are threatened, any other way than by death. Remember only whoſe daughter and whoſe queen you are, and then ſurely you cannot be afraid to deſcend to the ſhades. Maſiniſſa will ſoon follow you thither. Tears flowed down the prince's cheeks while he uttered theſe words; and, as ſoon as he had ſpoke them, he ruſhed out of the tent, where all things were prepared to give the unhappy princeſs the moſt ſpeedy and eaſy death. A ſlave, whoſe buſineſs it was to prepare poiſon, entered the tent as ſoon as Maſiniſſa went out, and preſented to the queen the fatal cup, which ſhe took with an air of great compoſure, upbraiding her weeping nurſe for diſhonouring her death with her tears. Then turning to the ſlave, Let my huſband, ſaid ſhe, know that I die contented, ſince I die by his orders. Aſſure him, that I was forced, contrary to my inclinations, to enter into engagements with another. My heart has been enſlaved to none but him; and as for my body, I readily abandon it to the fury of the Romans. Having thus ſpoke, ſhe drank the poiſon, and almoſt inſtantly expired. Scipio, to conſole the Numidian prince, careſſed and diverted him; and, when he had aſſembled his troops, ſtyled him king for the firſt time in a juridical way, and preſented him with a crown of gold, a curule chair, an embroidered robe, and a tunic adorned with palm-branches. Theſe honours counterbalanced in the prince's heart the remembrance of his dear Sophoniſba, and he now conceived hopes of becoming ſole maſter of all Numidia[1].

Maſiniſſa marries Sophoniſba.

[q] Liv. l. xxx. c. 10. Appian. in Punic. Zonar. l. ix. c. 10.

his

The Carthaginians make a fraudulent propoſal of peace.

And now, that the winter kept both armies from entering upon action, Scipio diſpatched Lælius with Syphax and the reſt of the captives to Rome, and returned himſelf to his old poſt near Tunis. The Carthaginians alarmed at his neighbourhood, endeavoured to gain time by a fraudulent treaty of peace, till Hannibal and Mago ſhould arrive from Italy. The better to impoſe upon the proconſul, they ſent deputies to Rome, and with them a ſmall number of Roman captives and deſerters: but at the ſame time time they prepared to renew the war with vigor, ſtrengthened their alliances on all ſides, and once more prevailed upon Philip of Macedon to engage in their intereſt. While Scipio, deceived by the fraudulent propoſals of the Carthaginians, was ſuſpending hoſtilities in Africa, Lælius, arriving at Rome, gave the conſcript fathers a pompous, but true, account of his friend's exploits. This occaſioned a univerſal joy in the city. The prætor publiſhed a decree for a general ſupplication, and the people crouded to the temples to return thanks for the proconſul's ſucceſs. As for Syphax, the ſenate ordered him to be conducted to Alba, in the country of the Marſi, and there kept to grace the triumph of the Roman general at his return. At the ſame time, the ſenate confirmed the title which Scipio had given to Maſiniſſa, and ſent him new preſents in the name of the republic [s].

[1] Liv. ibid, c. 14. Appian. in Punic. Zonar. l. ix. c. 12.

In Italy, Hannibal was now wholly confined to a corner of Brutium, and had not attempted any thing this campaign. As for his brother Mago, he did not venture to give battle to the conſul Servilius Geminus, who commanded an army in Hetruria; but falling down upon Inſubria, engaged two Roman armies there, under the conduct of the proconſul Corn. Cethegus and the prætor Quintilius Varus. The victory was long diſputed; but at length, Mago himſelf being wounded, the Carthaginians were routed, and obliged to take ſhelter among the mountains of Liguria. There he received ſtrict orders to repair forthwith to Carthage; but he had ſcarce doubled the iſland of Sardinia, when he died of his wound. Hannibal received the ſame orders, and complied with them, but not without great reluctance. He reſolved to take a body of Brutian troops with him; but theſe, refuſing to abandon their native country, took refuge in the temple of Juno Lucina, where the barbarous Carthaginian cauſed them all to be cruelly maſſacred. When he was out at ſea, he often looked back on the country he had hoped to conquer, and is ſaid to have uttered bitter execrations againſt gods and men. The joy at Rome, on the news of his departure, was inexpreſſibly great; but old Fabius endeavoured to allay it, by exclaiming, that the Roman ſtate was never in a more deplorable condition; but the people confided in the abilities of Scipio, and public thanks were appointed to be offered to the gods for Hannibal's departure [t].

Mago embarques for Africa but dies of a wound at ſea. Hannibal recalled.

Scipio

[s] Liv. l. xxx. c. 16. [t] Idem ibid. c. 19.

The Carthaginians break the truce.

SCIPIO had granted the Carthaginians in Africa a truce, till their embaſſadors returned from Rome; but, in the mean time, an accident diſcovered the inſincerity of their intentions. Scipio had ſent for a reinforcement of ſhips both from Sicily and Sardinia. The ſquadron from Sicily was diſperſed by a tempeſt, and many of the ſhips being driven near the port of Carthage, the Carthaginians ſeized and plundered them. Hereupon the proconſul ſent M. Bœbius with two other deputies to Carthage, to complain of the injuſtice, and require ſatisfaction; but the ſenate, depending on the return of Hannibal, agreed to ſend them back without an anſwer; nay, the quinqueremis, which carried the envoys, was attacked by the Carthaginian admiral, and, after ſome reſiſtance, forced to run aground near the ſhore, where moſt of the Romans were killed; but the embaſſadors themſelves had the good luck to eſcape [u]. This perfidiouſneſs was too plain a proof, that the war would be renewed with freſh vigour, as ſoon as Hannibal arrived; and it was not long before that general, ſo much wiſhed for, came within ſight of Africa, which he had left at nine years of age, and had not ſeen for thirty-three years paſt. He landed at Little Leptis, a city between Suſa and Adrumetum. About the ſame time Lælius and Fulvius returned from Rome, the latter to continue in his poſt of lieutenant in Scipio's army, and the former in quality of quæſtor as well as lieutenant. As for the troops which Mago commanded in Ciſalpine Gaul, the fleet, which carried them, was diſperſed by a ſtorm, and moſt of the ſhips were taken by the Romans.

Hannibal lands in Africa.

AND now the eyes of all nations in Europe and Africa were fixed on the two heroes of the age, Scipio and Hannibal, who were to enter the liſts. The latter, being informed that hoſtilities were begun anew, gained over as many of the princes of Numidia as he could, and among the reſt the ſecond ſon of Syphax, who joined him with a conſiderable body of Numidian horſe. On the other hand, Scipio purſued the war with all the fury, which the perfidiouſneſs of the Carthaginians deſerved. He took ſeveral towns by aſſault, put the garriſons to the ſword, and made the inhabitants paſs under the yoke. However, he diſmiſſed the Carthaginian embaſſadors, who had been arreſted by Bæbius on their return from Rome, after having treated them with great humanity and politeneſs, tho' moſt of the officers were for retaliating upon them the injuries which their embaſſadors had ſuffered.

IN

[u] Idem ibid. c. 25. Polyb. l. XV. c. 1.

In the mean time, Tib. Claudius Nero and M. Servilius Pulex being chosen consuls for the next year, they drew lots for their provinces, and it fell to the latter to conduct the army in Hetruria, and to the former to command the fleet in Africa; but, by a decree both of the senate and people, he was to leave the direction of all affairs at land wholly to the proconsul.

As Scipio continued ravaging the territories of Carthage and taking her cities, Hannibal was ordered to advance towards the enemy and stop their progress. Accordingly he left Adrumettum, marched a hundred and seventy-five miles, and encamped near Zama, a town in Africa Propria, about seventy-five miles from Carthage. From his new camp he sent out spies to observe the situation and strength of the enemy. These spies, being discovered and apprehended, were, by Scipio's orders, led into all the quarters of the camp, and, after they had been shewn every thing which they came to learn, dismissed with money to defray the expences of their journey. Hannibal was so struck with admiration at the magnanimity and confidence of the Roman general, that he immediately resolved to ask an interview with him, in order to a peace. With this view he addressed himself to Masiniſſa, begging him to intercede with the proconsul, and persuade him to come to an interview. Masiniſſa discharged his commission with zeal; but the people, having got the ascendant at Carthage, would hearken to no measures that tended to a reconciliation; nay, orders were dispatched to the general to continue the war, and come to a decisive battle without delay. But, notwithstanding these orders, which had been extorted from the senate by the people, Hannibal, having obtained the proconsul's consent to an interview, drew near, and encamped with his army about five miles from the Romans. There was between the two camps a large plain, entirely open, and where no ambush could be laid. Thither the two generals repaired, escorted by a like number of guards, and then, separating from their attendants each with his interpreter, they held a private conference. Perhaps two greater men never met, nor was ever any deliberation of more importance. These two heroes had never seen one another; but fame had given each a high esteem of the other. Hannibal is said to have been struck with admiration at the first sight of Scipio. His hair flowed down his back to a great length; he had an equal mixture of majesty and sweetness in his countenance; he was in his full strength and bloom, and deemed one of the moſt comely men of his age. There was nothing affected or too negligent about him. His habit was plain, but neat, and ſuch as became a ſoldier, who deſpiſed the ſtudied elegancies of dreſs. Their ſurpriſe at meeting kept them for ſome moments in a profound ſilence, which Hannibal firſt broke with a long deſcant on the viciſſitudes of fortune; and then, having artfully flattered the Roman, he propoſed the ceſſion of Spain, Sardinia, Sicily, and of all the iſlands between Italy and Africa, as the terms of peace. Scipio anſwered, with all the haughtineſs of a conqueror, that he offered nothing but what the Romans already poſſeſſed; that if he had made ſuch a propoſal before he left Italy, it might perhaps have been thought a tolerable one; but now that his republic would inſiſt upon conditions of a different nature, which he propoſed, adding, If you like theſe conditions, the Roman ſenate and people will condeſcend to enter into a treaty with your republic; if not, let us fly to arms, and decide the controverſy by the ſword. At theſe words the two generals parted, and each returned to his camp to prepare for a general action. Early the next morning, Scipio marched out his troops into the plain, and ſent a detachment to ſeize an eminence between the two camps. Theſe meeting with a detachment ſent by Hannibal for the ſame purpoſe, repulſed them, and made themſelves maſters of that poſt. This brought on a general action, contrary, as ſome ſay, to the inclination of Hannibal. Never was a more memorable battle fought, whether we conſider the generals, the armies, the two ſtates that contended, or the importance of the victory. Both generals diſplayed an uncommon ſkill in drawing up their men and chuſing their ground, and no leſs courage and reſolution in charging the enemy. They both repreſented to their men, that this battle muſt decide, whether Rome or Carthage muſt give law to the world. Never was victory more obſtinately diſputed. The Carthaginians, eſpecially in the ſecond line, performed wonders, repulſing three times the Roman legionaries with great ſlaughter. As for Hannibal's firſt line, which conſiſted of mercenaries, it was put to the rout at the firſt onſet, which occaſioned at length the defeat of the ſecond line; for the Romans, puſhing on the routed mercenaries with their bucklers, forced them back on the Carthaginians, and by that means put the ſecond into confuſion, and at length obliged them to give ground and betake themſelves to flight; but the greateſt difficulty was to break break into the enemy's phalanx, where Hannibal commanded in perſon. The phalanx was the choice of Hannibal's army, the Carthaginian general having formed it of thoſe veterans, who had made the Romans tremble in the plains of Italy. However, Scipio advanced boldly at the head of his haſtati to attack this formidable body; but the ground he was to croſs to come at the phalanx, being covered with dead bodies, bucklers, and darts, and the earth ſoaked with blood, and ſo ſlippery that his men could ſcarce keep their feet, Scipio commanded the principes and triarii to join the haſtati; and having drawn up all his men in one great front, marched over heaps of dead bodies againſt Hannibal, who, at the head of his phalanx, kept his men cloſe and waited for the enemy. The Romans fell upon this laſt body with a fury not to be expreſſed; but the Carthaginians, encouraged by the preſence and example of their leader, kept their ground, in ſpite of the utmoſt efforts of the whole Roman infantry. Scipio, reſolving either to complete the victory or die in the attempt, exerted, at the head of the legionaries, all his ſkill and perſonal bravery; but could not by any means break into that impenetrable body. The attack was often renewed, but to no purpoſe. The ground was covered with heaps of dead bodies; but not one of the Carthaginians offered to fly, or even quit his rank. The proconſul, finding all his efforts unſucceſsful, was at a loſs what to do; but while he was under the greateſt concern to ſee his brave legionaries fall in great numbers, without being able to gain the leaſt advantage over the enemy, Lælius and Maſiniſſa, returning from the purſuit of the Carthaginian and Numidian cavalry, appeared very ſeaſonably on the field of battle, and attacked the phalanx in the rear. And now Hannibal could hold out no longer; his phalanx was put in diſorder, and ſo terrible a ſlaughter was made of thoſe brave men, that few of them eſcaped. Hannibal, after having ſignalized himſelf by a thouſand acts of valour, was at length obliged to ſave himſelf by flight. Maſiniſſa, tho' wounded, purſued him cloſe, being extremely deſirous to crown his other exploits with the taking of the general himſelf; but the Carthaginian, being favoured by the darkneſs of the night, got ſafe into Thon, a ſmall city in that neighbourhood, attended only by twenty horſemen. From thence he fled, with one man only in whom he could confide, and taking the road to Adrumettum, reached that city in two days and two nights. In this action above twenty thouſand men were ſlain on the ſide of the Carthaginians, and as many priſoners taken, among whom were many Macedonians and Soſipater their commander. The Romans did not loſe above two thouſand men; a memorable victory, which raiſed Scipio above Hannibal, and paved the way for the Romans to the conqueſt of the world [w].

An interview between Scipio and Hannibal.

The battle of Zama.

Hannibal totally defeated.

HANNIBAL was ſoon called from Adrumettum to Carthage, where he declared in the ſenate, that they had no reſource but in a peace. Theſe words, in the mouth of the warlike Hannibal, were deciſive; and Carthage now thought of nothing, but uſing all means to ſoften the Roman general, whoſe humane temper was well known. Thirty of the chief nobility were diſpatched away in haſte to Tunis, where Scipio then was. Theſe deputies ſpared neither ſubmiſſions, proteſtations, nor promiſes. Scipio received them at firſt with the haughty air of a conqueror, and ſeemed not to give ear to their propoſals; but, at the bottom, he was as fond of concluding a peace as they; for he had certain intelligence from his friends in Rome, that the conſul Nero was equipping a fleet with all expedition, in order to come into Africa and rob him of the glory of finiſhing the war there. The next day therefore he ſent for the deputies, whom he had rejected the day before, and imparted to them the conditions, on which he was willing to grant them a peace. Theſe were as follow: 1. The Carthaginians ſhall live according to their own laws, and enjoy all the cities and provinces which they had in Africa before the war; but the Romans ſhall hold Spain, with all the iſlands in the Mediterranean. 2. The Carthaginians ſhall deliver up to the Romans all their deſerters, fugitive ſlaves, priſoners of war, and all the Italians whom Hannibal forced to follow him. 3. They ſhall deliver up into Scipio's hands all their ſhips of war, except ten triremes, with all their tamed elephants, and tame no more. 4. The republic of Carthage ſhall enter into no war, either in Africa or elſewhere, without the conſent of the Roman people. 5. They ſhall reſtore to Maſiniſſa all they have uſurped from him and his anceſtors, and even enter into an alliance with him. 6. They ſhall ſupply the Roman legions with corn, and pay their auxiliaries, till the return of the ambaſſadors they ſhall ſend to Rome. 7. They ſhall pay the Romans, in the ſpace of fifty years, ten thouſand Articles of peace between Rome and Carthage.

[w] Polyb. l. xv. c. 9. Liv. l. xxx. c. 30. Appian. in Punic. Zonar. l. ix. c. 19.

ſand talents at equal payments. 8. They ſhall deliver up to Scipio a hundred ſuch hoſtages as he ſhall chuſe, the youngeſt of which ſhall not be under fourteen, and the oldeſt not above thirty years of age. 9. Neither the peace nor the truce ſhall take place, till the Carthaginians have reſtored to the Romans the ſhips and effects taken from them during the late truce. 10. The Roman armies ſhall leave Africa within fifty days after the concluſion of the treaty. Theſe were hard conditions, but readily complied with, Hannibal himſelf declaring zealouſly for a peace. Purſuant to his advice, deputies were ſent to Scipio's camp, to make ſatisfaction for the ſhips and effects taken from the Romans during the laſt truce; and the whole ſum amounted to twenty-five thouſand pounds weight of ſilver [x]. Then the ſuſpenſion of arms took place, and embaſſadors were diſpatched to Rome, to obtain of the ſenate and people a ratification of the treaty. When the deputies were introduced into the ſenate, Aſdrubal, ſurnamed The Ram, who was at the head of them, and had always oppoſed the Barcan faction, made a modeſt ſpeech, in which he laid all the blame of the late war on the family of Hamilcar, and endeavoured to move the Romans to compaſſion, by repreſenting the deplorable condition to which the city and republic of Carthage were reduced. The conſcript fathers were divided in opinion; ſome were for concluding a peace on the terms propoſed by Scipio, who, ſaid they, is certainly the beſt judge, in the preſent caſe, of what is moſt for the intereſt of Rome. But, as Cn. Cornelius Lentulus and P. Ælius Pætus had been lately choſen conſuls, and the command of the fleet had fallen to the former, all his friends and relations were for continuing the war, that he might have the glory of completing the great work begun by Scipio. Among the reſt, C. Lentulus maintained, that nothing could be more to the intereſt of Rome, than utterly to deſtroy Carthage, and put it out of the power of the perfidious Africans to hurt Rome for the future. In the cloſe of his ſpeech, turning to the chief of the embaſſy, What gods, ſaid he, will you call to witneſs the ſincerity of your oaths? To which Aſdrubal immediately replied, The ſame who have ſo ſeverely puniſhed us for the breach of them. This anſwer was applauded by the aſſembly; and the ſenate plainly ſeeing, that Lentulus had no other view in declaiming with ſo much zeal againſt a peace, but to give the conſul, his relation, an opportunity of finiſhing the war, to the prejudice of Scipio, paſſed a decree, granting the Carthaginians their requeſt. The conſul Lentulus appealed from it to the people; who being aſſembled gave their conſent to a peace with Carthage, declaring, that they would ſuffer none but Scipio to conclude it, or bring back the troops to Rome. The Carthaginian embaſſadors were therefore diſmiſſed with a favourable anſwer, and ten deputies, attended by the feciales of the republic, ſent with them, to aſſiſt Scipio in ſettling the articles of the treaty. Upon their arrival at the proconſul's camp, the Carthaginians began to execute the articles they had agreed to. In the firſt place, they delivered up all deſerters and priſoners of war, and then their elephants, of which Scipio ſent ſome to Rome, and gave the reſt to Maſiniſſa; but nothing was more mortifying to the Carthaginians, than the delivering up all their ſhips, galleys, and frigates, except ten triremes, to the number of five hundred ſail. Theſe Scipio burnt at ſea, within ſight of Carthage. The laſt thing that remained was, to diſcharge the firſt payment of the tribute, which the Romans had required for fifty years; and this article was alſo executed, a tax being laid on all the citizens of Carthage for the raiſing of this ſum. And now Scipio prepared for his departure; but before he left Africa, with the conſent of the ten commiſſioners, he ſettled Maſiniſſa in the peaceable poſſeſſion of his hereditary dominions, and of all the places he had taken from Syphax. This done, he ſailed to Lilybæum, and thence to Italy. The news of his landing was no ſooner ſpread in the neighbouring places, but the people flocked from all parts to ſee the deliverer of Rome and the conqueror of the formidable Hannibal. From the port where he landed to Rome, the roads were crouded with infinite numbers of people, not only the citizens, but even the peaſants, running to behold and applaud the man, to whom they owed their liberty and preſervation. As he drew near Rome, the whole city went out to meet him; and ſuch of the citizens and ſenators, as had at firſt oppoſed his expedition, were the moſt earneſt to congratulate him on the ſucceſs of it. He wanted only to have received the congratulations of the great Fabius; but he was dead. However, the conqueror had the ſatisfaction to find, that the predictions of this old general had proved falſe, and ſerved only to augment his glory. Both ſenate and people concurred curred in decreeing him a triumph, which was the most magnificent one that had ever been seen in Rome. Polybius tells us, that king Syphax was carried in triumph, and that he died a few days after in prison; but he is therein contradicted by all the antients, who say, that the captive king died before the triumph at Tibur, whither he had been removed from Alba, the place of his confinement. Among the captives was, according to some writers, the famous poet Terence, at that time very young; at least it is certain, that he was a native of Africa, and was afterwards enfranchised by Terentius Lucanus, whose name he took. The senator Terentius Culleo, who had been taken by the Carthaginians and delivered by Scipio from a cruel captivity, to shew his gratitude, wore, in the triumphal procession, the pileus, a symbol of his having obtained his freedom. The booty Scipio brought from Africa was immense; among other things he delivered to the quæstors one hundred and twenty thousand pounds weight of silver. The republic, to shew her gratitude to a man, who had done her more important services than all her other commanders together, would have raised him above the level of other citizens, by bestowing on him, as some authors write, the perpetual dictatorship, and erecting statues to him, in the comitium near the rostra, before the senate-house, and even on the capitol; but Scipio wisely declined these extraordinary honours, contenting himself with the glorious name of Africanus, which history has preserved to him, as a lasting monument of his conquests in Africa [y].

[x] Polyb. l. xv. c. 18. Appian. in Punic. Liv. l. xxx. c. 37. Zonar. l. ix. c. 14.

The ſenate and people of Rome conſent to a peace with Carthage.

The articles of the treaty are executed, and an end put to the war.

Year after the Flood, 2803. Before Chriſt, 196 Of Rome, 552.

Scipio triumphs, and gets the surname of Africanus.

[y] Vide Liv. l. xxx. c. 43. Polyb. l. xvi. c. 12. Appian. in Punic. Zonar. l. ix. c. 14.

CHAP. VII.

The history of Rome, from the end of the second Punic war, to the destruction of Carthage.

ROME, by the peace she concluded with Carthage, was delivered from those continual alarms she had long been under from so powerful a rival. However, ſhe was not yet in ſuch a ſtate of peace and ſecurity as to ſhut the temple of Janus. While the treaty with the Carthaginians was executing, the Boii entering the territories of the allies of Rome, laid them waſte; which obliged the conſul Ælius Pætus to take the field. He detached Oppius with two legions and about two thouſand auxiliaries, to go before him and ravage the enemy's country; but that general was ſurpriſed by the Boii, ſurrounded on all ſides, and cut off with ſeven thouſand of his men. The conſul advanced to revenge his defeat; but the Gauls appearing no more in the field, he pillaged their country, and then falling down on Liguria, he obliged the Ingauni, who inhabited a ſmall canton of Liguria Maritima, to enter into an alliance with Rome [z]. Theſe were the only exploits of the conſul Ælius during this campaign. Upon his return to Rome, a decree was paſſed, impowering him to name a general to go with a fleet into Macedon; for the ſenate had juſt received advice, by embaſſadors from the Rhodians and from Attalus king of Pergamus, that Philip of Macedon was ſoliciting the ſtates of Aſia to join him againſt Rome. The perſon, whom the conſul named for this expedition, was Lævinus, who no ſooner appeared on the coaſts of Macedon, than he was joined by Aurelius, who had long reſided in Greece, to defend it, with a ſmall ſquadron and a few Roman troops. Theſe two, having conſulted together about the ſtate of Macedon and Greece, agreed to write to the ſenate, that they thought it neceſſary to declare war, without delay, againſt king Philip, who was preparing to make a deſcent upon Italy. Theſe letters arrived ſoon after the election of the new conſuls, P. Sulpicius Galba and C. Aurelius Cotta, who having aſſembled the people, prevailed upon them to vote for a war with the king of Macedon, notwithſtanding the oppoſition of Bæbius, a tribune of the people, who endeavoured to perſuade the centuries, that the nobility, from party-views, hindered them from enjoying any repoſe. The conſul Sulpicius, to whoſe lot Macedon fell, paſſed over into that kingdom with two legions; and, being aſſiſted by Attalus, the Rhodians, and the Ætolians, gained great advantages over Philip, as we have related at length in our hiſtory of Greece and Macedon.

The Boii gain a conſiderable advantage over the Romans.

The Romans reſolve upon a war with the king of Macedon.

While the conſul Sulpicius was employed in Macedon, the Gauls, headed by Hamilcar, whom Hanno had left in Italy, [z] Liv. l. xxxi. c. 2.

Italy, made a ſudden irruption into the lands of the allies of Rome; and having ſeized Placentia, put all the citizens to the ſword. From thence they advanced to Cremona; but the inhabitants of that city, ſhutting their gates againſt them, gave notice of their danger to Furius Purpureo the Roman prætor, who commanded five thouſand men of the allies in the neighbourhood of Ariminum. Furius, before he marched to their relief, wrote to the ſenate deſiring ſuccours, the Gauls being above forty thouſand ſtrong. Hereupon the fathers decreed, that either the conſul Aurelius, who was ſtill in Rome, ſhould put himſelf at the head of his legions, which were encamped in Hetruria, and haſten to the relief of Cremona; or, in caſe he declined it, that thoſe legions ſhould march to Ariminum without him, and be commanded in that expedition by Furius, who ſhould ſend his five thouſand men into Hetruria. As Aurelius choſe rather to continue at Rome, Furius, at the head of his legions, marched againſt the enemy, defeated them in a pitched battle near Cremona, and killed above thirty thouſand of them on the ſpot. The victorious prætor returned to Rome, where, after a warm debate in the ſenate, he was decreed a triumph. This is the firſt inſtance we find in the Roman hiſtory of a triumph granted to a general, who had fought under the auſpices of another; and on this account it was, that the oldeſt ſenators oppoſed it, though to no effect, the majority being for honouring the brave prætor with that mark of diſtinction [a].

The Gauls entirely defeated by the prætor Furius.

In the following conſulate of Cornelius Lentulus and P. Villius Tappulus, the Ætolians took part with the Romans againſt the king of Macedon; but Villius, to whoſe lot Macedon fell, ſtaid at Rome, till the ſeaſon was too far advanced to undertake any thing of moment this campaign. The other conſul Lentulus, who remained in Italy, inſtead of marching againſt the Gauls, who were not yet quelled, ſtaid at Rome, though there was no buſineſs of ſufficient moment to detain him there. The conſular year being expired, the republic beſtowed the faſces on Quinctius Flaminius and Sext. Ælius Catus, though neither of them had been in the prætorſhip, and the former, who was but thirty years of age, had never been ſo much as ædile. The war of Macedon fell to the lot of Flaminius, and that of Italy to Ælius. Cato was at the ſame time appointed prætor tor of Sardinia, where he made himſelf remarkable for his frugality, auſterity of life, and ſtrict juſtice in puniſhing offenders. His only amuſement was, to hear the inſtructions of the poet Ennius, under whom he learned the Greek ſciences, and perfected his fine genius. He baniſhed uſurers from his province, and reduced the intereſt upon loans almoſt to nothing [b].

[a] Liv. l. xxxi. c. 48. Faſt. Capit.

The progreſs of Flaminius in Macedon.

As for Flaminius, he immediately ſet out for his province, where he forced the intrenchments of king Philip, opened himſelf a way into the heart of Macedon, took ſeveral towns in Theſſaly, and, by his inſinuating manner, gained over the Achæans to the intereſt of Rome, as we have related at length in our hiſtory of the Achæans. His collegue Ælius, who had performed nothing worth mentioning in Ciſalpine Gaul, when the time of the elections drew near, was called home to aſſemble the centuries. The perſons raiſed to the conſulate this year were C. Cornelius Cethegus and Q. Minucius Rufus. They were both ſent into Ciſalpine Gaul againſt Hamilcar, who ſtill headed the revolt there. Flaminius was continued, in quality of proconſul, general of all the Roman forces in Greece, till the ſenate and people ſhould think fit to recal him. They alſo granted him a ſupply of five thouſand foot, three hundred horſe, and three thouſand ſeamen and rowers, and appointed his brother Quinctius to command the fleet under him. With this reinforcement Flaminius, having firſt gained over the city of Thebes and all Bœotia to the Roman intereſt, marched into Theſſaly in purſuit of Philip, and came up with him in the plains of Cynocephalæ. Here the two armies came to a general engagement, in which the Macedonians were entirely defeated, eight thouſand of them being killed upon the ſpot, and five thouſand taken priſoners. At the ſame time Androſthenes, one of Philip's generals, whom that prince had left in Corinth with ſix thouſand men, was defeated by Nicoſtratus prætor of the Achæans. Hereupon the Macedonian, having no other reſource but in a peace, ſubmitted to ſuch terms as Flaminius was pleaſed to impoſe upon him [c]. Thus ended the firſt Macedonian war, of which we have given a very particular account in our hiſtory of Greece.

Philip ſubmits to the terms of peace propoſed by Flaminius.

In Italy, the war, which was carried on with the Gauls by the two conſuls, gave the people more concern than that [b] Plut. in Caton.

[c] Liv. l. xxxiii. c. 14. Plut. in Flamin. Polyb. l. xiii. Juſtin. l. xxx.

that of Macedon. But their fears were ſoon quieted; for Cethegus, who marched againſt the Inſubres and Cenomani, gained a complete victory over them on the banks of the Mincius. Thirty thouſand of thoſe Gauls were killed upon the ſpot, and five thouſand ſeven hundred made priſoners, with their general Hamilcar. Minucius, the other conſul, having no opportunity of coming to a pitched battle with the Ligures and Boii, over-ran their country, and laid it waſte. For theſe ſucceſſes the ſenate and people ordered public thankſgivings, in all the temples of Rome, for four days [d]. The republic thought fit at this time to encreaſe the number of prætors to ſix, by creating two new ones for the government of Spain, which ſhe divided into two provinces, by the names of Hither Spain and Further Spain. But the Spaniards, highly diſpleaſed to ſee their country reduced to the ſtate of Roman provinces, took arms, and falling upon Sempronius, prætor of Hither Spain, cut him off with moſt of his troops. In Further Spain ſeveral towns revolted; and there was almoſt a general diſpoſition to ſhake off the Roman yoke.

The Ciſalpine Gauls defeated.

The Spaniards revolt.

THE new conſuls, L. Furius Purpureo and M. Claudius Marcellus, were ordered to continue the war with the Ciſalpine Gauls, who were not yet totally ſubdued; but Flaminius, by a new decree, was appointed to act as general in Greece, till ſuch time as the treaty with Macedon ſhould be concluded. Ten commiſſioners were ſent from Rome to aſſiſt him in this undertaking. Theſe, by the advice of Flaminius, decreed, that all the Greek cities, both in Europe and Aſia, ſhould be reſtored to perfect liberty. This decree was ſoon after proclaimed by a herald in a vaſt aſſembly of Greeks, met together from all parts to celebrate the Iſthmian games. Their amazement and joy on this occaſion was inexpreſſible. Many ſpeeches were made in praiſe of the Roman greatneſs and generoſity. The Ætolians, who had been refuſed ſome towns which they claimed, were the only people diſatisfied with the peace. They complained of it, and at length had recourſe to Antiochus king of Syria, who, at their inſtigation, paſſed over into Europe, under pretence of recovering Thrace, which his great-grandfather Seleucus Nicator had conquered from Lyſimachus.

IN Italy, the two conſuls carried on the war with great ſucceſs againſt the Gauls, and entirely deſtroyed two conſiderable ſiderable armies of thoſe rebels, plundered their country, and returned to Rome loaded with booty. After this, the republic was wholly employed in publiſhing ſome new edicts. The pontifices and augurs were now required, for the firſt time, to pay a tax towards the expences of the war; but they were at the ſame time eaſed of one burdenſome part of their function, a new ſort of ſacerdotal college being erected, under the name of Epulones, whoſe office was confined wholly to the care of religious feaſts. At firſt theſe epulones were three only, and all choſen out of plebeian families. The three firſt were C. Licinius Lucullus, T. Romuleius, then tribune of the people, who had got the law paſſed, and Porcius Læcas, who, two years before, while he was tribune of the people, had, in ſpite of all oppoſition, carried a law, forbidding, under very ſevere penalties, any magiſtrate to cauſe a Roman citizen to be whipt with rods. This law, which ſecured the ſhoulders of the people, to uſe the expreſſion of one of the antients [e], was called the Porcian law, not from the famous Porcius, known afterwards by the name of Cato the cenſor, as ſome have falſly imagined, but from Porcius Læcas, firſt tribune of the people, and afterwards one of the epulones [f]. However, this privilege did not extend to the armies, where the generals had an abſolute power of life and death.

[d] Liv. l. xxxii. c. 13---29. Polyb. Juſtin. ibid.

The Epulones inſtituted.

The Porcian law.

THE conſul Marcellus, when the time for the new elections drew near, aſſembled the centuries, who raiſed to the conſular dignity L. Valerius Flaccus and M. Porcius Cato. The conduct of the war in Spain fell by lot to the latter; but, while he was making the neceſſary preparations for his departure, the Roman ladies took a ſtep, which obliged him to ſtay longer at Rome than he expected. About eighteen years before, when Hannibal was ravaging Italy and the treaſury was exhauſted, a tribune of the people, named Oppius, had got a law paſſed, forbidding even the richeſt of the Roman ladies to uſe above half an ounce of gold in their apparel, to wear habits of various colours, or to make uſe of chariots, either at Rome or in the neighbouring villages, unleſs they were to aſſiſt at a public ſacrifice a mile off. The women of diſtinction, thinking it intolerable to be under this reſtraint, now that the republic abounded with riches, made a great ſtir to to get the law repealed. Valerius and Fundanius, two of the tribunes, preſented their requeſt to the comitia; and never was an aſſembly more divided. The capital, where it was held, was full of people crying out for and againſt the law. Even the women, neglecting the orders of their huſbands, the rules of decency, and the public authority, ran thither, beſet the paſſages which led from the capital to the voting place, ſolicited the men as they paſſed for their ſuffrages, and urged the juſtice of their pretenſions. As the affair was more than one day under deliberation, the women flocked to Rome from all the neighbouring colonies and towns, and offered petitions to the conſuls and prætors. But Cato was inexorable; he made a long harangue to the aſſembly in behalf of the law, full of ſatyrical reflections on the women, for their appearing in public to ſolicit votes. But the tribune Valerius made a very eloquent ſpeech in behalf of the women, in which he excuſed their appearing in public to ſolicit their own cauſe, and urged the reaſonableneſs of repealing the Oppian law. His harangue made ſuch an impreſſion on the minds of the people, that they all voted for the abrogation of the law, Cato being the only man that diſſented [g]. The Oppian law repealed.

[e] Sext. Pomp. faſt. [f] Cic. de orator. l. iii. Liv. ibid. c. 36.

And now the conſul ſet out for Spain with two legions, five thouſand auxiliaries, and five hundred horſe. He embarqued at Luna in Hetruria, and landed at Rhoda, now Roſes, in Catalonia. From thence he marched by land to Emporiæ, where he was joined by the prætor Helvius, who had juſt gained a conſiderable victory over the Spaniards. As Cato's troops conſiſted for the moſt part of raw ſoldiers, he took great pains to diſcipline them, conſidering they had to deal with the Spaniards, who, in their wars with the Romans and Carthaginians, had learned the military art, and were naturally brave and courageous. The general himſelf was a pattern to his men of vigilance, ſobriety, and aſſiduity in labour. His dreſs was always plain, he readily expoſed himſelf to the inclemencies of the ſeaſon, and his proviſions were the ſame which the common ſoldiers had. When a camp was to be pitched, he was always the firſt to take up the ſpade, and the laſt to lay it down. By this management, the conſul ſoon put his troops on the foot he deſired, and then marched in queſt of the enemy, but firſt ſent away his fleet, that his ſoldiers might place all their hopes in their bravery. With this the ſame view, when he came near the enemy, he took a compaſs, and poſted his army behind them in the plain; ſo that the Spaniards were between him and his camp. In the general action which enſued, the Spaniards were, by Cato's admirable conduct, entirely defeated and driven out of the field. After this victory, deputies flocked to his camp from all the neighbouring cities, entreating him to pardon them; but he did not accept their ſubmiſſions, till they had given him hoſtages. As the dread of his name had procured him great reſpect from all the neighbouring provinces beyond the Iberus, he wrote the ſame day private letters to the commanders of ſeveral fortified towns, ordering them to demoliſh without delay their fortifications, aſſuring them, that he would pardon none, but ſuch as readily complied with his orders. Every one of the commanders, believing the order to be ſent only to himſelf, immediately beat down their walls and towers; ſo that all the places in the two provinces beyond the Iberus were left defenceleſs, and ſeized by the Romans without oppoſition [h]. After this, the conſul marched into Further Spain, to aſſiſt Manlius the prætor, who commanded in thoſe parts; but not being able to bring the enemy to a battle, he returned to his old camp on the banks of the Iberus. In his way he took ſeveral towns and a prodigious booty, beſtowing on each of his ſoldiers, beſides the ſpoils, a pound weight of ſilver. When ſome of the officers ſeemed ſurpriſed at this liberality, he told them, It is better that many of the Romans ſhould return home with ſilver, than a few with gold. Of all the booty he appropriated nothing to his own uſe, but continued to live in as frugal a manner as the meaneſt ſoldier [i]. The campaign being ended, he ſailed back to Rome with his troops, and was honoured the next year with a triumph; after which he led a private life, employing his leiſure in ſtudy. He wrote a book of the origin of the cities of Italy, and another of agriculture, in which he took great pleaſure. He often pleaded before the ſenate and people, and was always ready to ſerve his country even as a private ſoldier [k].

[g] Liv. l. xxxiv. c. 2---7.

Cato defeats the Spaniards.

But to return to Flaminius: Tho' a peace was concluded with Philip, yet the ſenate being well appriſed, that, ſooner or later, they muſt break with Antiochus, judged it neceſſary, [h] Liv. ibid. c. 15. Appian. in Iberic. Plut. in Caton. [i] Plut. ibid. [k] Idem ibid.

neceſſary, that Flaminius ſhould continue in Greece; and as there was reaſon to ſuſpect, that Nabis, tyrant of Lacedæmon, would join the king of Syria, orders were ſent to the proconſul to attack and cruſh that tyrant. Purſuant to theſe orders, Flaminius marched with all his forces to beſiege Lacedæmon; and at the ſame time his brother Quinctius appeared on the coaſt with forty ſhips of war. Upon their appearance, ſeveral cities on the coaſt of Laconia ſubmitted to the Roman admiral, and among the reſt Gythium, a ſtrong town, and, as it were, the port of Lacedæmon. Hereupon Nabis ſent deputies to deſire a conference with the proconſul; which being granted, a peace was ſoon after concluded upon ſuch terms as Flaminius thought fit to impoſe. And now the proconſul, having entirely reſcued Greece from ſlavery, and put it out of the power either of Philip or Nabis to diſturb the peace he had eſtabliſhed in all parts, returned to Rome, where he was honoured with a triumph which laſted three days [l].

Nabis, tyrant of Lacedæmon, ſubmits to the terms of peace propoſed by Flaminius.

THE following year, when Scipio Africanus and Tiberius Sempronius Longus were conſuls, nothing happened worth mentioning, except a victory which the latter gained over the Ciſalpine Gauls. The enemy loſt eleven thouſand men, and the Romans five thouſand. Scipio hoped to be ſent againſt Antiochus; but as that prince had not yet openly declared againſt Rome, that illuſtrious Roman had no opportunity to ſignalize himſelf in his ſecond conſulate. In the beginning of the next year, when Cornelius Merula and Minucius Thermus were conſuls, three embaſſadors came to Rome from Antiochus, to propoſe an alliance with the republic; but the Romans requiring him to renounce all his pretenſions to Thrace, Æolis, and Ionia, to which he had an undoubted right, the embaſſadors returned to Antioch, much diſſatisfied with the reception they had met with at Rome [m]. This year P. Cornelius Scipio, ſurnamed Naſica, gained a conſiderable victory over the Luſitanians, who inhabited the country we now call the kingdom of Portugal. After this, he left Spain, and reſigned his army to Fulvius his ſucceſſor, who defeated in a pitched battle the united forces of the Vaccæi, Vectones, and Celtiberians, and took Hilermus, one of

The ſucceſs of the Romans in Spain and Ciſalpine Gaul.

[l] Liv. ibid. c. 24---36. Polyb. l. iv. c. 81. Plut. in Flamin.
[m] Liv. ibid. c. 58. Appian. in Syriac.

of their kings, priſoner. In Hither Spain, Flaminius can late into his province; but nevertheleſs made himſelf maſt of Ilucia, a ſtrong town, and cleared the country of ſom banditti who infeſted it. In Ciſalpine Gaul, the conſ Merula defeated the Boii near Mutina, killed fourteen thou ſand of them on the ſpot, made near two thouſand pri ſoners, among whom were three of their generals, an took two hundred and twelve colours, with ſixty-thre Gallic carts loaded with baggage. However, this victor was much diſputed, and coſt the conquerors dear; for the loſt five thouſand men, legionaries and auxiliaries, amon whom were twenty-three centurions, two tribunes of th ſecond legion, which was moſt expoſed, and many officer of the allies. Notwithſtanding this victory, Merula wa refuſed a triumph, being charged by Marcellus, one of hi lieutenants, with ſome miſconduct during the action. Q Minucius Thermus, the other conſul, marched againſt the Ligures, who, to the number of fifty thouſand men, were encamped near Piſa; but, as the conſular army conſiſted for the moſt part of raw and undiſciplined troops, Thermu acted only upon the defenſive.

When the time for electing new conſuls drew near, two patricians, of high birth and great merit, offered thei ſervice to the republic, viz. Scipio Naſica and L. Quinc tius. Two other illuſtrious citizens contended for the ple beian conſulſhip, Lælius and Domitius Ænobarbus. Na ſica and Lælius were ſupported by Africanus, who wa couſin-german to the former, and united to the latter by the ties of an intimate and ſtrict friendſhip. Quinctiu was recommended by his brother Flaminius, who ha lately been ſo ſucceſsful in Greece and Macedon. Whe the day appointed for the elections came, it appeared, tha Flaminius had more intereſt than the great Scipio, wh had the double mortification of not ſucceeding either fo his couſin or his friend; ſo that Quinctius was preferred t Naſica, and Ænobarbus to Lælius, tho' the plebeian con ſul was not recommended by any extraordinary merit of h own or his friends. Time had ſomewhat leſſened th eſteem and veneration of the people for the conqueror Hannibal; beſides, he had diſobliged the commons, by th invidious diſtinction he had procured the ſenators the ye before, of ſitting in the orcheſtra at the ſcenic ſhews, apa from other ſpectators. The new conſuls were ſcarce en tered upon their office, when news was brought to Ro of the defeat of the Ligurians by Thermus, now proconſ

He had been drawn by the enemy into a kind of Caudine Forks; but reſcued out of danger by a ſtratagem of the Numidian horſe in his army. Theſe advancing towards the poſts the Ligurians had ſeized, gallopped up and down the plain, without offering to attack them; ſo that they were rather an entertaining ſight, than matter of terror. Nothing could be more contemptible in appearance than the Numidian ſquadron; the men had no arms but one dart each; their horſes were ſmall and lean, and as they had no bridles, they thruſt out their necks, and hunk down their heads when they galloped. The Numidians added to the ridiculouſneſs of their appearance out of deſign, affecting to fall off their horſes, to raiſe the laugh and ſhouts of the enemy. This ſcene was ſo agreeable to the Ligurians, that many of them, not apprehending any danger from ſo contemptible an enemy, quitted their arms and ranks, and, ſitting down on the graſs, entertained themſelves with ſo diverting a ſight. On the other hand, the Numidians, advancing nearer and nearer, as if they could not govern their horſes, all on a ſudden clapping their ſpurs to them, flew through the Ligurian battalions with incredible ſwiftneſs, and, entering the plain, ſet fire to the enemy's magazines. This cauſed ſuch a diverſion, that one paſs was left unguarded, which gave the Romans an opportunity of ſeizing it, and getting out of the ſnare. After this, Rome ſent the proconſul a reinforcement of four thouſand foot and two hundred horſe; and then he forced them to come to a battle, and gained a complete victory over them. Nine thouſand of the enemy were killed on the ſpot, their army was diſperſed, and their camp beſieged, which they valiantly defended till night; but quitted it by favour of the darkneſs, and left it to be plundered by the Romans [n].

The Ligurians defeated.

While theſe things were tranſacting in Italy, the Ætolians raiſed new diſturbances in Greece. They reſolved, in a general diet of the nation, to renounce their alliance with Rome, and form a new confederacy againſt her. With this view they ſent deputies to Philip, Nabis, and Antiochus. Nabis immediately took arms and beſieged Gythium. Upon this beginning of a general commotion in Greece, the ſenate ſent three embaſſadors to the king of Syria; and on this occaſion it was, that Scipio Africanus, who accompanied them without a commiſſion, had the famous [n] Liv. l. xxxiv. c. 21..

famous conference with Hannibal, who, being perſecuted at home by the Romans and the enemies of the Barcan faction, had taken refuge in the court of Antiochus, as we have related in the hiſtory of Syria. As Rome would not abate any thing of her firſt pretenſions, the conference between the king and the Roman embaſſadors was warm, but not long. From this time Antiochus reſolved to declare war againſt Rome, and began to make the neceſſary preparations for paſſing over into Greece, contrary to the advice of Hannibal, who preſſed him to invade Italy. Purſuant to the reſolution he had taken of making Greece the ſeat of the war, he tranſported himſelf thither with only ten thouſand foot, five hundred horſe, and ſix elephants, theſe being all the forces he had ready. Hereupon war was immediately declared at Rome againſt Antiochus. The new conſuls, P. Cornelius Scipio Naſica and M. Acilius Glabrio, drew lots for their provinces; and Greece falling to the latter, he immediately ſet out for his province with twenty thouſand foot, two thouſand horſe, and fifteen elephants. On his arrival in Greece, he was joined by the allies of the republic there, and with their aſſiſtance he ſoon ſubdued all Theſſaly. In the mean time, Antiochus ſeized the famous ſtreights of Thermopylæ; but the conſul, by the advice and aſſiſtance of Cato, who ſerved in no higher a ſtation than that of a legionary tribune, forced the Syrian's ſtrong intrenchments, and obliged him to abandon Greece and retire to Epheſus. Much about the ſame time, Livius, the Roman admiral, gained a complete victory over the Syrians at ſea. The joy of the Roman people for theſe ſucceſſes in the Levant, was greatly heightened by the account they received from Ciſalpine Gaul of the entire reduction of the Boii by Scipio Naſica. This whole nation being ſubjected, their lands were ſhared among Roman colonies ſent thither for that purpoſe. The ſame year, the proconſul Thermus finiſhed the war with the Ligurians, by the reduction of their whole country; ſo that Italy now enjoyed a profound tranquillity. Endeavours were uſed by one of the tribunes to have Naſica and Thermus triumph jointly; but the ſenate granted that honour to the former only. His proceſſion was ſet off with all ſorts of ſpoils, with chariots made after the Gallic faſhion, ſtandards, vaſes of braſs, fourteen hundred and ſeventy collars of gold, twelve hundred and twenty horſe taken from the enemy, two thouſand three hundred and forty pounds weight of gold, and laſtly, a great number of captive captives, among whom were many of the chief nobility of the country. The conqueror beſtowed on each of his ſoldiers a hundred and twenty-five aſſes of braſs, that is, about eight ſhillings; to every centurion twice as much, and to every horſeman three times that ſum. At the ſame time, the ſenate granted an ovation to the proprætor Fulvius Nobilior, for having ſubdued the Vectones and Oretani in Spain. His proceſſion was adorned with ſpoils of great value, viz. a hundred and thirty thouſand pieces of ſilver money, ten thouſand pounds weight of ſilver in bars, and a hundred and twenty-five pounds weight of gold in ingots°.

Antiochus lands in Greece.

Is defeated at the paſs of Thermopylæ.

The Boii entirely ſubjected.

THE conſuls choſen for the new year were L. Cornelius Scipio and C. Lælius, the former brother, the other friend, to the great Scipio. As Lælius had the reputation of being the abler commander, he artfully propoſed to his collegue, that, inſtead of drawing lots, they ſhould leave the matter to the deciſion of the ſenate. Scipio Africanus adviſed his brother to accept the propoſal; and when the affair was laid before the ſenate, he offered to ſerve under his brother in quality of his lieutenant. There needed no other argument; the conſcript fathers immediately aſſigned Aſia to the two Scipios, as their common province. Thus the great Africanus ſhewed more regard to the honour of his family, than partial affection to his friend. It would have caſt a blemiſh on his brother, if he had not been judged fit to command the army againſt Antiochus; beſides, Lælius had been a little wanting in point of friendſhip, by expoſing his friend's brother to an affront. The two brothers immediately embarqued at Brunduſium with thirteen thouſand men, and landed at Apollonia. From thence they marched through Epirus and Theſſaly, and at length arrived before Amphiſſa, a city of the Ætolians, which Acilius was beſieging. Hither came deputies from the Athenians to intercede for the Ætolians; and the conſul was prevailed upon to grant them a truce, that they might ſend embaſſadors to Rome to treat of a peace with the ſenate. By this truce the ſiege of Amphiſſa was raiſed; and then Acilius reſigned the command of his two legions to the conſul, and returned home. The Scipios purſued their march through Macedon and Thrace, and croſſed the Helleſpont without oppoſition. Scipio Africanus fell ſick near Elæa; but his brother Lucius, being ambitious of gaining a victory in his abſence, purſued Antiochus, and, coming up with him near Magneſia, gave him a total overthrow. The Syrian loſt on this occaſion fifty thouſand men, including priſoners of war, and the Romans not above three hundred foot and twenty-five horſe. Tho' the ſucceſs of this action was chiefly owing to the bravery and conduct of Eumenes king of Pergamus and his brother Attalus, yet Lucius Scipio gained by it the ſurname of Aſiaticus, as his brother had done, by his victories in Africa, that of Africanus. Antiochus, after his defeat, readily ſubmitted to ſuch conditions of peace as the conſul thought fit to impoſe upon him, as we have related at length in the hiſtory of Syria, to which we refer our readers. The Ætolians, hearing of the defeat of Antiochus, ſued for a peace in good earneſt; which was granted them at the interceſſion of the Athenians, but upon very ſevere conditions; which the reader will find in our hiſtory of Ætolia. Acilius, who had overcome Antiochus at the paſs of Thermopylæ, was honoured on his return with a triumph, in which were carried many valuable ſpoils of Greece and Aſia, a great many ſilver vaſes carved after the Greek faſhion, all the plate of the king of Syria, and his moveables, which were of an ineſtimable value, two hundred and thirty ſtandards, three thouſand pounds weight of ſilver in bars, an hundred and thirteen thouſand Attic tetradrachmæ, amounting to fourteen thouſand five hundred and ninety-five pounds ſixteen ſhillings and eight pence, and two hundred and forty-eight ciſtophori, pieces of ſilver coin current in Aſia, and amounting in the whole to four thouſand two hundred and ſeventy-one pounds two ſhillings and two pence. Acilius alſo brought home with him forty-five crowns of gold, which were preſents made him by cities in alliance with Rome. Thirty-ſix Ætolian chiefs, taken priſoners in war, walked before the triumphant victor's chariot [P].

° Liv. xxxvii. c. 46. & l. xxxvi. c. 40. Tab. triumph.

Antiochus totally defeated in the battle of Magneſia. Year after the flood, 2814. Before Chriſt 185. Of Rome, 563.

THE conſular year being expired, the faſces were transferred from Scipio and Lælius to M. Fulvius Nobilior and Cn. Manlius Vulſo. The former was ſent into Ætolia, to ſettle affairs there, and the latter into Aſia, where he took upon him the command of the army, which had defeated Antiochus at Magneſia. As no nation had lent Antiochus more powerful ſuccours than the Gallo-Greeks or Galatians, the conſul reſolved to march againſt them and attempt the reduction of their country. They were originally ginally Gauls, who, to the number of twenty thouſand, had, in the time of Brennus, croſſed the Alps, and, paſſing through Thrace, entered Aſia, and ſettled in an inland country beyond Caria and Phrygia. The conſul being aſſiſted in his long march by Seleucus, the king of Syria's ſon, and by Attalus the brother of Eumenes, arrived at length upon the confines of Galatia. Upon his approach, the Galatians retired with all their effects and proviſions to the tops of high mountains, with a deſign to tire out the patience of the Romans, by leaving them to languiſh away their time in deſolate plains. The conſul marched firſt againſt thoſe Galatians, who were called Toliſtobii, and were poſted on mount Olympus, forced their intrenchments, ſlew great numbers of them, and took forty thouſand priſoners, including women and children. After the defeat of the Toliſtobii, the conſul led his army againſt the Tectoſagi and Trocmi poſted on mount Magaba, attacked their intrenchments with the ſame ſucceſs as he had done the other, and forced the whole nation to ſue for peace. He would not treat with them on the ſpot; but ordered their deputies to follow him to Epheſus, whither he retired with his army, the weather beginning to be very cold in Galatia. The Galatians obeyed the commands given them, and concluded a peace with the conſul on his own terms [q].

The Romans carry the war into Galatia.

[P] Liv. l. xxxvii. c. 48.

The Galatians entirely reduced.

The war with the Gauls in Aſia was ſcarce finiſhed, when a new one broke out with the Gauls and Ligurians in Italy. M. Valerius Meſſala, one of the new choſen conſuls, was ordered to Piſa, to watch the motions of the latter, and C. Livius Salinator, the other conſul, to march againſt the former. Fulvius and Manlius were continued in their reſpective provinces, in quality of proconſuls. Fulvius had, during his conſulſhip, eſtabliſhed all the cities on the continent of Greece in their antient freedom; but had added the iſland of Cephalenia to the demeſns of the republic. Hither he tranſported his troops, and now, being proconſul, made it the place of his reſidence, giving from thence law to all Greece. All diſputes between the Greek cities and ſtates were brought to this tribunal; ſo that in reality they had only an appearance of liberty. The conſuls of this year performed nothing worthy of notice [q] Liv. l. xxxviii. c. 26, & ſeq. Polyb. legat. xxxv. Val. Max. l. vi. c. i.

againſt the Gauls and Ligurians; and therefore the new conſuls, M. Æmilius Lepidus and C. Flaminius, were both ordered againſt the Ligurians, whom they reduced in one campaign, and made all quiet between Hetruria and the Alps. During their conſulate, the proconſul Manlius arrived at Rome. After the reduction of Galatia, he had croſſed the Helleſpont in his way home. As he was paſſing through Thrace, a body of ten thouſand Thracians attacked him in a narrow paſs between woods, where the Romans could not form themſelves in order of battle. However, he eſcaped the danger, with the loſs only of ſome ſpoils, and, continuing his march through Theſſaly and Epirus, arrived at Apollonia, where he was to embarque; but the ſeaſon being now far advanced, he paſſed the winter there, and arrived in Italy early in the ſpring. He halted in the neighbourhood of Rome, and demanded, as uſual, a triumph of the ſenate, aſſembled in the temple of Bellona; but his requeſt met with great oppoſition. It was objected, that he had undertaken his expedition againſt the Galatians, without the orders of the republic, and carried it on more like a robber, than a Roman conſul. It was alſo urged, that he had been wanting in conduct, ſince he had ſuffered the Thracians to rob him of part of the ſpoils. But Manlius ſhewing that the Gauls had aſſiſted Antiochus, and excuſing, as well as he could, his diſaſter in Thrace, after a long debate, a triumph was decreed him by a majority of votes [1].

The Ligurians ſubdued.

And now, Rome being diſengaged from all foreign wars, the moſt zealous republicans took pleaſure in proſecuting the chief men in the ſtate. They thought it perhaps a refined policy to humble thoſe in times of peace, whom they had exalted in times of war. Cato, who had always been a ſecret enemy to Scipio Africanus, no ſooner ſaw the republic in a condition to do without him, but he reſolved to deſtroy him. With this view he engaged two tribunes of the people, both Petiliuſes, to cite him before the tribes, to anſwer to a charge of miſdemeanour. One of the tribunes made it matter of accuſation againſt him, that he had ſpent a whole winter in effeminacy and pleaſures at Syracuſe, before he went into Africa. The other charged him with the pillage of Locri, and many violences, which had been committed in that city by Pleminius, whom he had appointed governor of the place; but the grand

Scipio Africanus is accuſed before the tribes.

[1] Liv. ibid. c. 45.

grand accuſation was, that he had received from Antiochus great ſums to procure him an advantageous peace. The number of the accuſers was ſo great, that the whole day was ſpent in their ſpeeches; ſo that the trial was poſtponed to twenty-ſeven days after. In the mean time, the tribunes moved in the ſenate, that Scipio ſhould be obliged to give an account of the ſpoils he brought from Aſia, and produce the book, in which he had ſet down the ſums he had received from Antiochus; and the ſenate complied with the motion. When the time came for determining the affair, it happened to be the ſame day of the year, on which he had obtained the famous victory over Hannibal at Zama. Scipio brought his book of accounts with him, and having only ſhewed it to the people, he tore it in pieces before them, ſaying, On this day Hannibal was conquered and Carthage ſubdued: why then do we trifle it away in hearing idle declamations? The gods expect us at the capitol: follow me, Romans; let us go thither, and jointly offer up our vows and thankſgivings. He had ſcarce uttered theſe words, when the tribes began to move, and the whole aſſembly followed him; even the apparitores and other officers, whoſe buſineſs it was to attend the tribunes, deſerted them. This was a glorious triumph for the accuſed. However, he was cited to appear a third time; and then he gave way to the ſtorm, and retired to his country houſe near Liternum, in the neighbourhood of Naples. The tribunes proceeded in order to condemn him as by default, tho' Lucius Scipio appeared, and alledged, that his brother was ſick. This fury againſt ſo venerable a man raiſed the compaſſion even of his enemies. A tribune of the people, named Tib. Gracchus, tho' an avowed enemy to the Cornelian family, declared, to the great ſurpriſe of all, that, he thought, Scipio Aſiaticus ought to be believed concerning the ſickneſs of his brother; and then went on thus: If Scipio were at Rome, I would oppoſe his appearing to take his tryal. What! ſhall the conqueror of Carthage appear at the foot of our tribunal, to be reviled there by an inſolent populace? Did he conquer Hannibal and Antiochus, to fall a ſacrifice to the two Petiliuſes? Shall we pretend to triumph over a man, who has been honoured with ſo many triumphs of the nobleſt kind? Let him at leaſt find a ſafe retreat for his old age, in the port to which he is retired for refuge. This unexpected declaration from an old enemy of the Scipios, had ſuch an effect on the reſt of the tribunes, that they diſmiſſed the tribes, telling them, that they would conſider more maturely of the matter. Whether Scipio's ſickneſs was feigned or real, we cannot determine; but it is certain that he died ſoon after, in the forty-eighth year of his age. He is ſaid to have been ſo diſſatisfied with the cowardice of the ſenate, the iniquity of the people, and the ingratitude of both, that, at his death, he deſired his wife Æmilia, the daughter of Æmilius Paulus, who died ſo glorioufly at the battle of Cannæ, not to carry his bones to Rome. She erected a mauſoleum for him at Liternum, and there placed his ſtatue, with that of the poet Ennius, who was probably his faithful friend and companion of his retreat. Such was the end of the greateſt commander, and the moſt accompliſhed citizen the republic had ever produced [s].

But comes off with great glory.

Scipio Africanus dies at Liternum.

But even the death of the great Scipio did not extinguiſh the hatred of the implacable Cato to the Cornelian family. He thought the vaſt authority of the Scipios might prove dangerous to the republic, and therefore was reſolved to humble them. In republican ſtates precaution is often carried to ingratitude and injuſtice. To have done great ſervices is ſometimes enough of itſelf to make a man ſuſpected. The eyes of Africanus were ſcarce cloſed, when Cato turned his fury, or, as ſome call it, the bitterneſs of his zeal, againſt Aſiaticus. He drew up a petition to the people, which waspreſented by the two Petiliuſes: That the tribes would ſolicit the ſenate to order an enquiry concerning what money had been received from Antiochus, and from the cities in his dominions. This petition was accepted, and a decree paſſed purſuant to it, with an additional clauſe, That an enquiry ſhould be likewiſe made after the money received from the allies of Antiochus. Furius Purpureo, one of the ten commiſſioners, who had been ſent into Aſia to ſettle the condi ions of peace with Antiochus, got this clauſe added, in order to include Manlius in the proceſs, who was ſuppoſed to have drawn great ſums from the Galatians. The perſon whom the faction pitched upon was Terentius Culeo, at that time prætor, but a ſecret enemy to the Cornelian family, tho' he had been formerly delivered out of ſlavery in Africa by Scipio Africanus, as we have related above. Before this unjuſt and partial judge Scipio Aſiaticus was cited to appear, and with him Aulus Scipio Aſiaticus is arraigned before the people.

And Manlius.

[s] Vide Liv. l. xxxviii. c. 50. Appian. in Syriac. Aul. Gel. l. iv. c. 18. Val. Max. l. iii. c. 5. Plut. in Cat. & Gracch.

Aulus and Lucius Hoſtilius, two of his lieutenants, and C. Furius his quæſtor. The prætor, having heard the charge and received the depoſitions, declared Scipio, Aulus Hoſtilius, and Furius convicted; the firſt of having received from Antiochus, to procure him a favourable peace, ſix thouſand pounds weight of gold and four hundred and eighty pounds weight of ſilver; the ſecond of having received twenty pounds weight of gold in ingots and four hundred and three pounds weight of ſilver in bars; and the third of having received a hundred and thirty pounds weight of gold and two hundred of ſilver. The prætor condemned them to pay large fines. The two latter immediately gave ſecurity; but Scipio, ſtill inſiſting on his having accounted with the republic for all the money he had brought from Aſia, and refuſing to give bail, the officers were ordered to carry him to priſon; but then Scipio Naſica appealed from the prætor's ſentence to the people. While he was pleading his couſin's cauſe, the prætor Culeo ordered the houſe of the accuſed to be ſearched, and his goods to be confiſcated. But he did not find effects enough to pay the fine laid upon him; and it was much to his juſtification, that among all his moveables, not one thing was to be found, which could be judged to have been brought from Aſia. Naſica, being informed of this, took thence an occaſion to juſtify his relation. At the ſame time, Gracchus, diſſenting from the other tribunes, ſpoke with great eloquence in his favour. The multitude applauded what Gracchus ſaid; truth ſeized their minds all at once, and changed their affections. However, the prætor would not repeal his decree; ſo that Scipio's effects remained confiſcated, by which means he was reduced at once to a ſtate of beggary. His relations and clients endeavoured to perſuade him to accept of their preſents; and, had he done ſo, he would have been richer than he was when his effects were confiſcated: but it was in vain; he had courage enough not to fear poverty, and therefore would accept of nothing more than bare neceſſaries. Rome afterwards acknowledged his innocence and merit, ſent him embaſſador to terminate ſome differences between Eumenes and Seleucus, and, upon his return, took pleaſure to enrich him; inſomuch, that he was in a condition to celebrate games for his victory over Antiochus for ten days together at his own expence. All the ſhame of his diſgrace fell on the ungrateful Culeo and the tribunes. As for Cato, he only kindled the fire, and diſappeared when it burnt with moſt fury; and, the people being diſ-

Scipio is fined.

And his effects confiſcated.

poſed

posed to think he meant well, he lost no reputation; nay, he was soon after promoted to the greatest honours. The Scipios, to express their gratitude to Gracchus, bestowed on him Cornelia, the younger daughter of the great Africanus, the elder being married to Scipio Nasica [t].

Before the consular year expired, the proconsul L. Fulvius Nobilior, being returned from Greece, obtained a triumph, but not without great opposition, for having reduced Ætolia. His triumphal procession was set off with a great number of crowns of gold, a vast quantity of gold in ingots, and silver in bars, immense sums of Attic and Macedonian money, multitudes of marble and brass statues, &c. Fulvius made rich presents to his officers, gave twenty-five denarii, that is, sixteen shillings and one penny, to every common soldier, fifty to every centurion, and seventy-five to every horseman. As for his games, they were celebrated with the greatest magnificence and judgment.

The combats of the athletæ introduced at Rome

On this occasion the combats of the athletæ were seen for the first time in the arena at Rome, and the people were likewise entertained with the hunting of lions and panthers. The consulship of Sp. Posthumius Albinus and Q. Marcius Philippus was spent in making preparations for carrying on the war against the Spaniards and Ligurians, who began to move anew. In the beginning of the following consulship of Appius Claudius Pulcher and M. Sempronius Tuditanus, three commissioners were sent into Greece, to terminate some disputes between the king of Macedon and the Greek republics. The commissioners chose the vale of Tempe for the place where the contending parties should meet; and Philip had the mortification to be cited before the tribunal of three Roman citizens. The seats in the court of judgment were so disposed, that the commissioners sat uppermost, the accusers next, and the king the lowest, as a criminal; for the Greeks pretended, that he had seized and detained many cities belonging to them. Philip answered the charge brought against him with an air of threatening; whereupon the commissioners, thinking it necessary to humble him, pronounced the following decree: Our will and pleasure is, that the Macedonian garrisons evacuate forthwith all the places in dispute, and that the kingdom of Macedon be reduced to its antient limits. Philip made no reply, but readily submitted to the sentence pronounced

[t] Liv. l. xxxviii. c. 54---60. Plut. in Scip. & Gracch. Val. Antias apud Liv. l. xxxix. c. 22.

nounced againſt him. Thus the citizens of Rome began to determine the fate of monarchs, and treat them as their vaſſals [u]. In Spain, the two new prætors, Quinctius and Calpurnius, fought two battles with the Luſitanians. In the firſt they were defeated, and loſt five thouſand men; but in the ſecond they gained a complete victory, killed and took thirty thouſand of the enemy, and quieted the country for ſome time. In Italy, both conſuls marched againſt the revolted Ligurians. Sempronius carried the war into the country of the Apuans, in the eaſt of Liguria, and Claudius into the territory of the Ingauni, more to the weſt. The former ravaged the enemy's fields, pillaged their villages, burnt down the woods, and opened a way into the heart of the country. The latter fought ſeveral ſucceſsful battles with the Ingauni, took ſix of their cities, made a great many priſoners, and put to death forty-three of the ringleaders of the revolt. The campaign being ended, both conſuls returned to Rome to hold the comitia for the great elections, in which P. Claudius Pulcher and L. Porcius Licinius were choſen chief magiſtrates for the new year. When the cenſors came to be elected, Cato and L. Valerius Flaccus were, by a great majority, preferred to Scipio Aſiaticus, and other men, who had done the republic eminent ſervices. The cenſors immediately drew up a new liſt of the ſenators, and degraded ſeven of that illuſtrious body, among whom was Quinctius, the brother of Flaminius, for having killed with his own hand, when he commanded in Ciſalpine Gaul, a Boian nobleman, who fled to him for protection. This treacherous murder he had committed, only to gratify the curioſity of a young Carthaginian, for whom he had conceived an execrable paſſion, the infamous pathic expreſſing a deſire to ſee a man die a violent death. Manlius, or, as others call him, Manilius, was degraded, and his name ſtruck out of the liſt of the ſenators, only for having ſaluted his wife in the preſence of his daughter. Scipio Aſiaticus, ſince his diſgrace, had been made a Roman knight; but the rigid cenſor, out of an inveterate hatred to the Cornelian family, took away, upon what pretence is not known, the horſe which the public kept for him; ſo that the conqueror of Antiochus was now reduced to the condition of the moſt private perſons. After this, his ſeverity fell on multitudes of people; he laid a heavy tax on fine moveables, jewels, and all ſuperfluities perfluities both of men and women; and, by ſuch popular acts, made himſelf ſo acceptable to the people, that they erected a ſtatue to him in the temple of Health. After the expiration of his cenſorſhip, he ſpent the reſt of his days in a private life. He found exerciſe enough for his philoſophy in his own family, his wife, who was of a high birth, being very expenſive and ill-tempered. He took upon himſelf the education of his only ſon, whom he would not ſuffer to be taught the learning of the Greeks, ſaying, That the only ſtudy of a Roman ſhould be how to conquer, and how to govern conquered nations. He was a great ſoldier, an able ſtateſman, an eloquent orator, a learned hiſtorian, and well ſkilled in rural affairs: but theſe accompliſhments were counterbalanced by great defects; he was extravagantly ſevere, jealous of the merit of others, and ambitious to a high degree. As a private perſon, he lived frugally; but it was only to lay up money. He uſed to ſay to his ſon, That no man deſerved any eſteem till he had doubled his fortune. In public he was ever extolling continence; but in private was familiar with a beautiful ſlave. To revenge himſelf on his ſon and daughter-in-law for treating her contemptuouſly, he married a ſecond time in his old age; and when his ſon aſked him by what act of diſreſpect he had incurred his diſpleaſure, he replied, I have no manner of complaint to make againſt you; your conduct is ſo prudent, that I am reſolved to have other children like you. As his merit and virtues were known, and his vices concealed, he acquired the eſteem of the multitude; ſo that, tho' four-and-forty times accuſed before the people, he was always acquitted [w].

The Roman arms proſper in Spain and Liguria.

The cenſorſhip of Cato.

[u] Liv. l. xxxix. 21.

His character.

THE following conſulſhip of Q. Fabius Labeo and M. Claudius Marcellus was remarkable for the death of two famous men, Philopœmen, of whom we have ſpoke in the hiſtory of the Achæans, and Hannibal, who, perſecuted by the Romans, had taken refuge in the court of Pruſias king of Bithynia; but that prince being obliged by the Romans, contrary to the laws of hoſpitality, to withdraw his protection from him, the illuſtrious Carthaginian, to avoid falling into the hands of his implacable enemies, either drank a poiſonous draught, or took a ſubtle poiſon, which he is ſaid to have always carried about with him him in his ring [x]. Thus died, to the eternal reproach of the Roman name, in the ſeventieth, or, as others will have it, in the ſixty-fifth year of his age, a hero, who, to his laſt breath, was the terror of Rome. He is ſaid to have upbraided the Romans, before he took the poiſonous potion, with degenerating from the virtue of their anceſtors, who had honourably prevented the murder of their mortal enemy Pyrrhus; whereas they forced a king to violate the moſt ſacred laws of hoſpitality, to get rid of an old man in a treacherous and cowardly manner.

The death of Philopœmen and Hannibal.

[w] Plut. in Cat. Liv. l. xxxix. c. 44.

THE following year, when L. Æmilius Paulus and Cn. Bæbius Tamphilus were conſuls, proved barren of great events. But the conſulate of P. Cornelius Cethegus and M. Bæbius Tamphilus was remarkable for conſiderable victories, gained by the Roman armies in Spain and Liguria, and for the ſuppreſſing of a revolt in Sardinia. The ſame year a ſtop was put to immoderate expences in feaſts and entertainments. At the motion of one Orcius, a tribune of the people, it was enacted, that no man ſhould ſpend more than one hundred aſſes of braſs, that is, ſix ſhillings and five pence, at an entertainment; and the number of gueſts was likewiſe limited. The Orcian law.

In the ſucceeding conſulſhip of A. Poſthumius Albinus and C. Calpurnius Piſo, the proconſul Paulus Æmilius defeated the Ligurians, and reduced the whole country of the Ingauni. The Ingauni reduced.

Q. Fulvius Flaccus, the prætor of Hither Spain, was attended with equal ſucceſs againſt the Celtiberians, whom he defeated in a pitched battle, killed twenty-five thouſand of them on the ſpot, made four thouſand eight hundred priſoners of war, and took above five hundred horſes and ninety-eight ſtandards. The Romans loſt two hundred legionaries, ſeven hundred of the Latin troops, and two thouſand four hundred of the Spaniſh auxiliaries [y]. The Celtiberians defeated.

This ſame year Gentius, one of the kings of Illyricum, who had countenanced ſome piracies in the Adriatic, made his ſubmiſſions to the ſenate, and was pardoned. Before the conſular year was expired, the famous plebiſcitum was publiſhed, called the Villian law, from Villius Tappulus, tribune of the people, who got it paſſed in the comitia. It enacted, that no man ſhould be quæſtor before he was one-and-thirty years of age, curule ædile, before thirty-ſeven, prætor before forty, or conſul before forty-three; The Villian law.

and

[x] Liv. l. xxxix. c. 51. Corn. Nep. in Hannibal. Plut. in Flamin.
[y] Liv. l. xl. c. 33.

and this law continued in force till the fall of the republic [z].

Two brothers choſen conſuls.

WHEN the time came for the elections, two brothers, the firſt inſtance of this kind, were promoted to the conſular dignity, Q. Fulvius Flaccus, who had lately triumphed for his victories in Spain, and L. Manlius Acidinus Fulvianus. The latter was called Manlius, becauſe he had been adopted into the Manlian family. Both conſuls marched againſt the Ligurians. Manlius performed no memorable exploits; but Fulvius, who was a great ſoldier, defeated the Ligurians in a pitched battle, killed three thouſand two hundred of them, and forced the reſt to leave their mountains and ſettle in the flat country. In Spain, the prætors Sempronius and Albinus made themſelves maſters of Munda and Certima, two important places belonging to the Celtiberians, over whom they gained ſeveral conſiderable victories. Sempronius is ſaid to have killed near forty thouſand of the Vaccæi and Luſitani; and Albinus to have deſtroyed about the ſame number of Celtiberians. The former, on his return, brought into the public treaſury forty thouſand pounds weight of ſilver, and the latter twenty thouſand. they were both honoured with a triumph [a]. In Italy, M. Junius Brutus and A. Manlius Vulſo being choſen conſuls, the latter, without any orders from the ſenate or people, marched againſt the Illyrians and Iſtrians, commanded by Gentius their king. The conſul was ſhamefully ſurpriſed in his camp, and driven out of it; but he ſoon after recovered it again, and killed eight thouſand of the enemy, while they were drunk with the wine they had found in it. The king, drunk as he was, was put on horſeback, and conveyed away by his guards. Notwithſtanding this victory, the war was not finiſhed, before the ſucceeding conſulſhip of C. Claudius Pulcher and Tib. Sempronius Gracchus. Claudius, by taking three towns, Neſattium, Mutila, and Faveria, brought the whole Iſtrian nation under ſubjection to Rome. The conſul Sempronius maintained in Sardinia and Corſica the glory he had acquired in Celtiberia. He either took or killed twenty thouſand of the rebels, and was on that account honoured on his return with a triumph, which was ſet off with a prodigious number of Sardinian captives, who were all ſold by auction; and hence came the proverb, Sardinians to ſell, tho' others carry the origin of it higher, as we have obſerved elſewhere.

The Iſtrians ſubdued.

THE

[z] Cic. Philip II. [a] Liv. l. xli. c. 7.

THE conſul Claudius, having ſubdued Iſtria, led his forces into Liguria, where he gained a complete victory over the rebels, having taken or killed fifteen thouſand of them. He then returned to Rome to preſide at the comitia, when Cn. Cornelius Scipio Hiſpalis and Q. Petilius Spurinus were choſen conſuls; but the former dying ſoon after of an apoplectic fit, C. Valerius Lævinus was elected in his ſtead. Petilius, jealous of the glory which Claudius gained in Liguria, where he acted as proconſul, haſtened thither, and took upon him the command of the army; but having attempted to force the Ligurian intrenchments, he was run through with a javelin, and killed, while he was leading on his men, after a repulſe, to renew the attack. However, the Romans, tho' deprived of their general, gained a conſiderable victory, and killed above five thouſand of the enemy, after they had made themſelves maſters of their camp [b]. The two following years were barren of military exploits. In the firſt P. Mucius Scævola and M. Æmilius Lepidus were conſuls; and in the ſecond Sp. Poſthumius Albinus and Q. Mucius Scævola. During the conſulſhip of the latter, the ſtreets of Rome were paved, which had never been done ſince the building of the city. L. Poſthumius Albinus and M. Popilius Lænas being choſen conſuls for the new year, the latter marched againſt the Stelliates, a people in Liguria, bordering on the river Tanarus, and in a ſharp conflict, which laſted three hours, killed ten thouſand of them, and took ſeven thouſand priſoners and eighty two ſtandards. The Romans loſt three thouſand men, and the number of their wounded was exceeding great. After this defeat, the Stelliates, finding the forces of their nation reduced to ten thouſand men, ſubmitted to the conſul, without ſettling any terms. Hereupon Popilius took away their arms, diſmantled their cities, reduced them all to ſlavery, and ſold them and their goods to the beſt bidder; but this ſevere proceeding was reſented by the ſenate, and a decree paſſed, commanding Popilius to reſtore the money he had received for the ſale of the Stelliates, to ſet them at liberty, return to them their effects, and even to purchaſe new arms for them. The ſenate concluded their decree with words, which poſterity ought never to forget, Victory is glorious, when it is confined to the ſubduing of an untractable

The Stelliates ſubdued.

The equity of the Roman ſenate.

[b] Idem ibid. c. 16.

tractable enemy; but it becomes ſhameful, when it is made uſe of to oppreſs the unfortunate [c].

Two plebeians choſen conſuls.

THE following year, the Romans choſe for the firſt time two plebeians to the conſulate, P. Acilius Ligus, and C. Popilius Lænas. From this time to the dictatorſhip of Julius Cæſar, nothing was more common than to ſee two plebeian conſuls together. During the preſent conſulate, Eumenes king of Pergamus came to Rome, out of pure zeal to acquaint the ſenate, that Perſes, who had ſucceeded his father Philip in the kingdom of Macedon, was ſolliciting alliances in Greece and Aſia, and making great preparations for war. Tho' the ſenate kept the intelligence they had received from Eumenes an inviolable ſecret, yet Perſes, not doubting, but he had acquainted the conſcript fathers with his deſigns, reſolved to be revenged on him; and accordingly employed ruffians to murder him as he was going to Delphos, to pay his homage to the god worſhipped there. The king, tho' dangerouſly wounded, was afterwards cured; but the ſenate was ſo exaſperated at this wicked attempt upon the life of their friend and ally, that they commanded Solon and Hippias, two deputies ſent by Perſes to clear him of the crimes laid to his charge, to leave Rome immediately. They were ſcarce gone, when war was formally declared with the king of Macedon, for having uſurped from the allies of Rome ſeveral cities, and refuſed to reſtore them to their lawful owners. The prætor Sicinius was ordered to ſail from Brunduſium, with ten thouſand men for Apollonia, and begin hoſtilities. In the mean time, the conſular year being near expired, P. Licinius Craſſus and C. Caſſius Longinus were raiſed to the ſupreme magiſtracy. Macedon falling by lot to the former, two legions were appointed him of ſix thouſand foot and three hundred horſe each, to which were added ſixteen thouſand auxiliary foot and ſix hundred horſe. Leave was likewiſe given him to chuſe as many as he pleaſed of the veterans, who were not yet fifty years old. When the neceſſary preparations were made for embarquing, new embaſſadors came from Perſes, repreſenting, that it was needleſs to ſend an army into Macedon, ſince the king their maſter was ready to give the republic all the ſatisfaction ſhe could require; but the ſenate ordered them back with the following anſwer, That a conſul would ſoon be ſent into Macedon, and that Perſes might treat with him, if he was ſincerely diſpoſed to give the Romans ſatisfaction [d].

The Romans declare war with Perſes king of Macedon.

SOON

[c] Liv. l. viii. c. 8. [d] Idem ibid. c. 10—36.

SOON after, the conſul Licinius embarqued with his troops at Brunduſium, landed at Apollonia, and marched to the Roman camp at Nymphæum; which poſt the prætor Sicinius had ſeized ſome months before. Hereupon Perſes aſſembled his army at Citium, conſiſting of forty thouſand Macedonians, and ſome thouſands of Gauls, Thracians, Cretans, Bœotians, and Ætolians. With theſe forces, which formed the moſt conſiderable army that had been ſeen in Macedon ſince the time of Alexander the Great, Perſes marched againſt the conſul Licinius, who, having left Nymphæum, was advanced into Theſſaly, and had encamped on the banks of the Peneus. As the king was much ſuperior to the conſul in cavalry, he drew near his camp, and inſulted him ſo far, that he was obliged to ſend out his light armed troops to oppoſe thoſe of the enemy; and then a ſmart action enſued, in which the Macedonians had all the advantage. The Romans, full of ſhame and confuſion, left their camp in the dead of the night, croſſed the river Peneus, and intrenched themſelves on the other ſide of it. The next morning the king paſſed the river after them; but they removed to a ſtronger and more inacceſſible place, where they received a reinforcement of a thouſand foot, a thouſand horſe, and twenty-two elephants, under the command of Miſagenes, the natural ſon of Maſiniſſa. The king, not being able to force the Roman intrenchments, and hearing that troops were marching from all parts to join the conſul, ſent, by the advice of his wiſeſt counſellors, a new embaſſy to him, offering to maintain inviolably the treaty which had been made with his father, and to reſtore to the allies of Rome all the places which Philip had yielded to them; but Licinius returned the following anſwer to the deputies, There is no peace for Perſes, till he ſurrenders up himſelf and his dominions to the Romans at diſcretion. Hereupon Perſes, laying aſide all thoughts of peace, prepared to renew hoſtilities. He attempted to bring the enemy to a general engagement; but the conſul declining it, he ſet out in perſon, with two thouſand foot and a thouſand horſe, to fall upon ſome parties of the Romans, who were buſy in reaping. Licinius, having timely notice of his deſign, haſtened with the greater part of his army to the aſſiſtance of his foragers, met the king, and cut in pieces the beſt part of his life-guard, who were thought invincible. This defeat ſo diſheartened the king, that he retired into Macedon to ſpend the winter there. As for the conſul Licinius, after Perſes gains ſome advantage over the Romans.

The Romans gain ſome advantages over Perſes.

ſome inconſiderable expeditions in Theſſaly, he took up his winter-quarters in Bœotia. His collegue Caſſius, tho' confined by his lot to Italy, had attempted to make his way into Macedon through Illyricum; but was recalled by the ſenate, and ſeverely reprimanded for engaging in ſuch an enterprize without orders [e].

THE following year, A. Hoſtilius Mancinus and A. Attilius Soranus being choſen conſuls, Macedon fell by lot to the former, who immediately ſet out for his province, and, arriving in Theſſaly, took upon him the command of the army; but was attended with no ſucceſs in two attempts which he made to enter Macedon. He firſt tried to force the paſs of Elymea; but his troops were put to flight by Perſes. After this, he endeavoured to make his way into Macedon through Theſſaly; but the king oppoſed him there likewiſe, and offered him battle; which the conſul, either out of cowardice or an exceſs of precaution, declined; ſo that this campaign was chiefly ſpent in vain projects. Hoſtilius was recalled, under pretence of aſſiſting at the elections, when Q. Marcius Philippus and Cn. Servilius Scipio were choſen conſuls. Theſe, when the levies came to be made, found the Roman youth, through ſome unaccountable humour, very obſtinate in refuſing to enliſt themſelves. Hereupon two laws were enacted by the people for regulating the enrolments. The firſt required all thoſe, who were under forty-ſix, to appear, in order to be incorporated in the legions; the ſecond ordered all thoſe who were come from Macedon, within three years laſt paſt, to return to their duty. The publication of theſe laws had ſo good an effect, that, in the ſpace of eleven days, a ſufficient number of ſoldiers were raiſed to recruit the armies in Spain and Macedon, and to form four legions, which were to be ready to march any-where upon the firſt orders. The levies being made, the conſul Marcius, to whoſe lot Macedon fell, haſtened into Theſſaly, reſolving, in ſpite of all difficulties, to force a paſſage into Macedon. Perſes, which is very ſurpriſing, never once appeared to oppoſe his march, tho' the roads were ſo bad, the paſſes ſo narrow, and the mountains ſo ſteep and craggy, that, by Marcius's own confeſſion, the Macedonian might have deſtroyed the whole conſular army with a handful of men. The conſul, having entered Macedon, marched firſt to Dium, and afterwards to Heraclea, made himſelf himſelf maſter of both theſe places, and then returned towards the frontiers of Theſſaly, his army being greatly diſtreſſed for want of proviſions. As he had no account of the king's army, he turned his thoughts wholly to the making of roads from Theſſaly to Macedon, in order to facilitate the conveyance of proviſions from one country to the other. He erected magazines all along the road, fortified them, and built houſes for the convenient lodging of thoſe who guarded the convoys. By this means he opened for his ſucceſſors an eaſy entrance into a kingdom, which had hitherto been deemed inacceſſible. In the mean time, Perſes continued inactive in his camp, on the banks of the Enipeus, where he ſpent the greater part of the ſummer, without ſo much as offering to diſturb the conſul in the proſecution of a work, which ſecured to the Romans the conqueſt of Macedon. And now, both armies being retired into their winter-quarters, Perſes, thinking it ſafeſt for him to ſue for a peace, engaged Pruſias king of Bithynia and the Rhodians to be his mediators. The former employed entreaties, and the latter menaces; but neither the one nor the other prevailed. As for the Rhodians, the ſenate threatened to chaſtiſe them for their inſolence, as ſoon as the conqueſt of Macedon ſhould be finiſhed [f].

The conſul Hoſtilius attempts in vain to enter Macedon.

[e] Liv. ibid. c. 42—51. Plut. in Æmil.

The conſul Marcius Philippus opens a way into Macedon.

At Rome, the people were very uneaſy at the ſlow progreſs of their generals in the conqueſt of Macedon, and therefore applied themſelves wholly to find out a man, who ſhould be capable of recovering the glory of the republic, and putting a ſpeedy end to this war. The perſon they caſt their eyes upon was Paulus Æmilius, a patrician of conſummate virtue, bravery, and prudence, who had been conſul thirteen years before. He was the ſon of the conſul Æmilius, who periſhed in the battle of Cannæ, and the father of the famous Scipio Æmilianus, who was afterwards known by the name of the Second Africanus. This latter was named Scipio, from his adoption into the Cornelian family by the ſon of the great Scipio. The perſon raiſed to the conſulate with Æmilius was Licinius Craſſus, a man of great probity, who thought himſelf obliged to yield the conduct of the war in Macedon to his collegue, without drawing lots. Early in the ſpring, Æmilius ſet out for Macedon, and the prætor Anicius for Illyricum; Gentius, the king of that country, having openly declared for Perſes. The prætor reduced all Illyricum in thirty days. Having firſt

The Romans conquer Illyricum.

[f] Liv. l. xliv. c. 18—46. Plut. in Æmil. Polyb. in legat. 87.

firſt defeated the Illyrian fleet, he marched his land forces to Scorda, the metropolis of the kingdom, whither Gentius had retired with an army of fourten thouſand men. Though the place was ſtrong and defended by ſuch a numerous garriſon, yet the king was ſo terrified at the approach of the Roman army, that he ſubmitted to the prætor at diſcretion, who committed him to the care of a legionary tribune. Some days after, the king, the two queens, his mother and his wife, with three princes of the royal family, were ſent captives to Rome, to grace in due time the prætor's triumph [g]. As for the conſul Æmilius, as ſoon as he arrived in Theſſaly, where his army was encamped on the banks of the Enipeus, he detached five thouſand men, under the conduct of his eldeſt ſon Fabius Æmilianus and of his ſon-in-law Scipio Naſica, to ſurpriſe Pythium on the top of mount Olympus. The king, who was encaped on the oppoſite ſide of the Enipeus, having notice of this motion, ſent out a more numerous detachment to intercept that of the conſul; but the Macedonians were defeated and cut in pieces. This diſaſter, and the news the king received at the ſame time of the misfortunes of Gentius, ſo diſheartened him, that he abandoned his camp, and retired in great haſte into Macedon, under the walls of Pydna. Thither Æmilius followed him; but reſtrained the impetuoſity of his men, who were eager to fight the very moment they arrived. He firſt formed a camp, and having finiſhed his lines, made his troops retire within them to repoſe themſelves that night. As the enemy's forces were drawn up in battalia, Scipio Naſica took the liberty to tell the conſul, That his declining an engagement would bring the reproach of cowardice upon him and his whole army; but the general made only this ſhort reply, At your age I talked as you do; and you at mine will act as I do. The next day a mere accident brought on a general engagement. A horſe, having got looſe from a Roman who was leading him, ran pretty far into a river between the two camps. Two Thracians of the enemy's guard, poſted on the other ſide, went into the water to ſeize the horſe, and three Romans at the ſame time haſtened to recover him. One of the Thracians being killed, his countrymen on guard, to the number of eight hundred, advanced to revenge his death. This put the Romans in motion, and by degrees brought brought on a general engagement. The king's army consisted of forty-five thousand men, the finest troops that had been seen in Macedon since the time of Alexander the Great. However, the Romans, by the excellent conduct of their general, obtained a complete victory, though they were considerably inferior in number. The Macedonians lost near twenty-five thousand men in the battle, five thousand were taken prisoners in the plain, and six thousand more in Pydna. The Romans are said not to have lost above an hundred men. As for Perses, he fled first to Pella, from thence with his family and his treasures to Amphipolis, and lastly, being abandoned by all his troops, to the island of Samothrace, which was dedicated to the mother of the gods, and on that account respected by all nations. The fugitive prince took up his habitation in a temple dedicated to Castor and Pollux, and there waited for some favourable turn of fortune. In the main time, the consul, having sent orders to Octavius the Roman admiral to invest the island of Samothrace with his fleet, marched into the heart of Macedon, and made himself master of Pella, Thessalonica, and many other important places. When he arrived at Siræ, a town in the most eastern part of the kingdom, he was met there by embassadors from Perses, who presented him a letter from their master; but Æmilius no sooner read the direction of the letter, where Perses styled himself king, than he turned his back upon the embassadors, and dismissed them without an answer. Hereupon the unhappy prince changed his style, and wrote as a private person, Perses to the consul Paulus Æmilius. This letter was well received, and the consul, in compliance with the king's request, sent three officers to confer with him. These demanded by way of preliminary, that Perses should abdicate the title of king, and leave his fate to be determined by the senate and people of Rome. This Perses would not by any means comply with, insisting that a lawful sovereign could not lay down his sovereignty, but with his life. In the mean time, Octavius, having landed his men in Samothrace, and invested the island with his fleet, pressed Perses, in an amicable manner, to throw himself on the clemency of the Romans. But the king being inflexible on that head, Octavius tried all means possible to persuade the inhabitants to drive him out of their island. The king, apprehending they might be prevailed upon to drive him away or deliver him up, privately contracted with a Cre-tan merchant, whoſe ſhip lay at anchor under Demetrium, a promontory of Samothrace, to convey him and his effects into Thrace, to Cotys, his old friend and ally. He ſent part of his treaſures before him, and in the dead of the night ſet out himſelf, accompanied only by his eldeſt ſon Philip and three men in whom he could confide. His other children, his pages, who were the ſons of the chief lords of the kingdom, and all his retinue, he left behind him to the mercy of the Romans. But when he came to the ſhore, to his great ſurpriſe, he found no ſhip there. The perfidious Cretan had ſet ſail in the dead of the night, and carried off the treaſure he had on board. Hereupon the king, having rambled about the ſhore for ſome time in great perplexity what to do, returned at laſt into the temple, and concealed himſelf in a corner of it. In the mean time, Octavius having cauſed proclamation to be made by ſound of trumpet, That all Macedonians in Perſes's retinue, who ſhould ſurrender themſelves voluntarily to the Romans, ſhould have life and liberty, not one remained with Perſes, except his eldeſt ſon. The unhappy prince, ſeeing himſelf thus abandoned by his domeſtics, and even his children, ſurrendered himſelf at length to Octavius, and conſented to be carried, with his eldeſt ſon and the remains of his treaſure, to Amphipolis, whither the conſul came to meet him and receive his ſubmiſſions. Æmilius received him with great honour and reſpect, entertained him the firſt day at his own table, and then committed him and his children to the care of an officer, till the time he had fixed for tranſporting them to Italy [h]. Thus ended the ſecond Macedonian war, and with it the Macedonian monarchy, after it had continued in ſplendor about an hundred and ninety-three years, reckoning only from Philip, the father of Alexander the Great.

[g] Liv. ibid. c. 30—32. Appian. in Illyric.

Perses entirely defeated in the battle of Pydna.

Perſes ſurrenders himſelf to the Romans.

And now, the conſular year being near expired, the comitia were held for the new elections, when Q. Ælius Pætus and M. Junius Pennus were raiſed to the conſulate. Liguria fell by lot to the latter, and Ciſalpine Gaul to the former. Æmilius was continued in the command of the army in Macedon as proconſul, and Anicius and Octavius in their reſpective provinces in quality of proprætors. During this conſulate, princes and embaſſadors came to Rome from all parts of the Levant, ſome to be rewarded, others to [h] Liv. l. xliv. c. 32—46, & l. xiv. c. 6—8. Plut. in Æmil. Polyb. legat. 71.

to return thanks, ſome with compliments and preſents, and others to make apologies for their conduct. Pruſias, king of Bithynia, came to Rome in perſon, and carried his flattery to a monſtrous exceſs of meanneſs. The Rhodians, who had ſtood neuter and ſhewed a great inclination to aſſiſt Perſes, were deprived of all dominion over Lycia and Caria, formerly granted them. But the chief buſineſs of the ſenate was, to ſettle the government of the two conquered countries, Illyricum and Macedon. Inſtead of reducing them to Roman provinces, it was determined to change them into republics. Accordingly, ten commiſſioners were appointed to aſſiſt Paulus Æmilius in ſettling Macedon, and five to aſſiſt Anicius in Illyricum. When the affairs of Macedon and Illyricum were ſettled, and the proconſul was preparing to conduct his army back to Rome, he received poſitive orders from the ſenate to go into Epirus, and to plunder and demoliſh the cities of that country, for having aſſiſted Perſes, after they had by repeated oaths promiſed to be faithful to the Romans. Æmilius executed his inſtructions with great prudence and ſeverity, as we have related in the hiſtory of Epirus, and then ſet out for Italy. Anicius and Octavius arrived at Rome much about the ſame time, and they were all three honoured with triumphs. That of Æmilius was the fineſt Rome had ever ſeen. The city was ſo much enriched by the valuable ſpoils brought from Macedon, that ſhe had no occaſion to lay any tax on the people from this time to that of Auguſtus. Perſes ſent from the common gaol, where he was kept, to entreat the victor to ſpare him the confuſion of appearing in his triumphal proceſſion. Æmilius gave the meſſenger the following anſwer; Tell Perſes, that it long has been, and ſtill is, in his power to free himſelf from our chains. This was telling him, that death alone could deliver him from the diſgrace he feared. But the cowardly king, preferring the moſt ſhameful of all indignities to what was then deemed an honourable death, was led in triumph with his ſons, Philip and Alexander, his little daughter, and the chief nobility of Macedon. The triumph of Æmilius was followed the next day by that of the proprætor Octavius, admiral of the Roman fleet. The triumphal proceſſion of Anicius, the conqueror of Illyricum, was poſtponed for three months. King Gentius with his wife, children, his brother Caraventius, and ſeveral lords of his court, were led before the triumphant victor's chariot. Gentius was ſent with his family to Iguvium, a city of Umbria; but Perſes was ſhut up in a cloſe priſon in Alba a city of the Marſi, where he died miſerably, as we have related in the hiſtory of Macedon [i]. Philip his eldeſt ſon is ſaid to have died before him; but his ſecond ſon, being put out to a turner, gained his livelihood, firſt by that profeſſion, and afterwards by doing the buſineſs of a ſcribe. And thus ended the race of the kings of Macedon [k].

The kingdoms of Illyricum and Macedon changed into republics.

Perſes dies.

THE following year, when C. Sulpicius Gallus and M. Claudius Marcellus were conſuls, proved barren of memorable events. In the ſucceeding conſulſhip of T. Manlius Torquatus and Cn. Octavius Nepos, Terence, the famous dramatic poet, was in his higheſt reputation. The faſces were afterwards transferred to A. Manlius Torquatus and Q. Caſſius Longinus; during whoſe adminiſtration a cenſus was made, by which there appeared to be in Rome 337552 citizens fit to bear arms. Paulus Æmilius, who was at this time one of the cenſors, ſoon after the expiration of his cenſorſhip, fell ſick of a lingering diſeaſe, which in the end carried him off. Notwithſtanding the prodigious ſums with which he had filled the treaſury of the republic, he continued poor himſelf, and after his triumph led a private life. In the height of his glory, his two ſons by a ſecond marriage died, the elder five days before his triumph, and the younger three days after it. Juſt before his retreat he harangued the people, and taking notice of this ſevere ſtroke of fortune on himſelf, expreſſed an acquieſence to it, provided it might ſatisfy the gods, and avert any evils from the republic, which in ſo much proſperity ſhe might have reaſon to expect [l].

Paulus Æmilius dies.

Tib. Sempronius Gracchus and M. Juventius Thalna being raiſed to the conſulate, the latter was obliged to ſail with an army into Corſica to quell a rebellion there; while the other marched againſt the Ligurians, who had taken arms anew. But theſe wars were in reality no more than an amuſement. During this conſulate, Antiochus Epiphanes died, and was ſucceeded by his ſon Antiochus Eupator, who was but nine years old. Demetrius, the ſon of Seleucus the late king's elder brother, had an indiſputable right to the crown of Syria. But the Romans, thinking it more for the intereſt of their republic to have a child upon the throne, excluded Demetrius, who had been twelve years an hoſtage at Rome, and, without the conſent or privity

[i] Vide Vol. viii. Book ii. Chap. ii. Sect. viii. near the end.
[k] Liv. l. xlv. c. 40, & ſeq. Plut. in Paulo. Æmil. [l] Plut. ibid. Liv. ibid.

vity of the Syrians, declared young Antiochus the ward of the republic, and appointed Cn. Octavius and two other Roman senators to govern, as his guardians, the kingdom of Syria, in the name and under the direction of the republic. Nor were the Romans satisfied with doing this injustice to Demetrius; they gave instructions to Octavius and his collegues to burn all the ships with decks belonging to their ward, disable his elephants, and, in a word, to weaken, as much as possible, the forces of his kingdom. In the following consulship of P. Cornelius Lentulus and Cn. Domitius Ænobarbus, Octavius set out for Syria, and arriving at Laodicea, a maritime city between Tripolis and Antioch, began to put the severe orders of his republic in execution, under pretence, that, in virtue of the treaty with Antiochus the Great, the Syrians were to build no more ships of war, nor tame more elephants. The Syrians were highly exasperated at this presumption, especially Lysias, the young king's guardian, who being encouraged by the rage of the people against Octavius, hired an African to assassinate him. When the news of his murder reached Rome, Demetrius, who was still there, applied once more to the senate for leave to go and take possession of the kingdom, which of right belonged to him. But being a second time refused, by the advice of his friend Polybius the historian, he made his escape from Italy, got safe into Syria, and was there received and proclaimed king. The year following, when M. Valerius Messala and C. Fannius Strabo were consuls, the new king of Syria, to ingratiate himself with the Romans, sent an embassy to Rome, with a rich present of a crown of gold, and at the same time delivered up the African, who had murdered Octavius. The senate accepted the present, but sent back the assassin, telling the deputies, that such a victim was not an adequate satisfaction to the republic for the affront she had received [m].

The Romans declare young Antiochus king of Syria their ward.

Cn. Octavius one of his guardians assassinated.

THE consuls for the new year, L. Anicius Gallus and M. Cornelius Cethegus, went rather to encamp, than make war, one in Liguria, the other in Cisalpine Gaul. During their administration, the Romans entered into a treaty of confederacy with the Jews; and, at the request of Judas Maccabæus, who implored their protection against Demetrius, wrote the following imperious letter to the Syrian: Why have you insulted and oppressed the Jewish nation?

The Romans enter into an alliance with the Jews.

[m] Polyb. legat. 114---120. Appian. in Syriac. Justin. l. xxxiv.

nation? Know that the Jews are our allies. If you give them the trouble to ſend another embaſſy to complain of you, we will treat you as an enemy, and purſue you by ſea and land [n]. Of the two conſuls for this year Cethegus only gained himſelf ſome reputation by drying up the Pomptine marſhes, which infected the air of the whole neighbourhood, and reducing them to a fruitful plain, which, however, was afterwards drowned again by freſh overflowings of the rivers. The following conſuls, Cn. Cornelius Dolabella and M. Fulvius Nobilior, ſignalized themſelves yet leſs in their adminiſtration. In the conſulate of their ſucceſſors, M. Æmilius Lepidus and C. Popilius Lænas, Demetrius drove Ariarathes king of Cappadocia from the throne, for refuſing to marry his ſiſter, and placed upon it Orofernes, a ſuppoſititious ſon of the late Cappadocian king. Ariarathes fled to Rome for refuge, and pleaded his cauſe before the ſenate. But the Romans, purſuant to their common maxims of policy, ordered the kingdom to be divided between the two competitors [o]. The next year, when Sextius Julius Cæſar and L. Aurelius Oreſtes were conſuls, the Dalmatians, who bordered upon Illyricum, made incurſions, and committed great robberies there, though it was a country tributary to the republic. Nay, they would ſcarce vouchſafe an audience to Fannius the Roman embaſſador, who came to complain of theſe proceedings and demand ſatisfaction. The ſenate therefore, upon the report which Fannius made of the haughty treatment he had met with, reſolved to begin a war with Dalmatia.

The firſt occaſion of the third Punic war.

Another embaſſy, ſent this year into Africa, at the head of which was Cato the cenſor, paved the way for the third Punic war. Maſiniſſa had invaded Tyſca, a rich province belonging to the Carthaginians, and the diſpute being referred to the arbitration of the ſenate, ten commiſſioners were ordered to go into Africa, and determine it upon the ſpot. But when Cato and his collegues arrived there, the Carthaginians refuſed to accept them for judges, ſaying, that Scipio had ſettled their limits by a treaty of peace, and that, to alter his appointments, would be to reflect on the memory of the greateſt of men. This declaration provoked the pride of Cato to the higheſt degree. However, he diſſembled his reſentment, and, leaving Tyſca a prey to Maſiniſſa's troops, went to Carthage, and there examined every [n] 1 Maccab. viii.

[o] Polyb. in legat. 126. Diodor. Sicul. eclog. l. xxxi.

every thing with a malicious eye. When he returned to Rome, he reported, that Carthage was grown immenſely rich, that her magazines were crouded with ſtores, her ports full of ſhips, and that the war ſhe was making with Maſiniſſa, was only an introduction to a more important one with Rome. He concluded with a warm exhortation to the ſenate to loſe no time, but immediately to ſend troops with orders utterly to deſtroy a city, which would ever be an obſtacle to the progreſs of the Roman arms. From this time he was always inciting them to deſtroy Carthage. Whenever he gave his opinion in the ſenate, be the ſubject what it would, he never failed to conclude with theſe words; I am alſo of opinion, that Carthage ſhould be deſtroyed. But Scipio Naſica, who after the death of Paulus Æmilius, had the chief ſway in the ſenate, conſtantly oppoſed the too rigid cenſor in this particular. The two ſucceeding conſuls, C. Marcius Figulus and L. Cornelius Lentulus Lupus, prevailed upon the ſenate to declare war with the Dalmatians, the conduct of which was committed to the former, who, croſſing the Adriatic, landed in Illyricum, and marched thence againſt the enemy. The Dalmatians, who were a ſavage, but brave, people, ſurpriſed and defeated the conſul. But Scipio Naſica, who was raiſed to the conſulate the next year with C. Claudius Marcellus, being appointed to continue the war, laid ſiege to Delminium, the metropolis of Dalmatia, made himſelf maſter of it, and in one campaign brought the whole country under ſubjection. His collegue Marcellus gained likewiſe ſome advantages over the Ligurians [p]. The republic having choſen Q. Opimius Nepos and L. Poſthumius Albinus conſuls, ſhe ordered the latter into Spain, and the former into Tranſalpine Gaul. The avarice and extortions of the Roman prætors in Spain had cauſed almoſt a general revolt there. The legion commanded by the prætor Calpurnius Piſo had been defeated by the Luſitanians, and he himſelf with his quæſtor Terentius Varro had been killed in the battle. Poſthumius was therefore ordered thither. But his wife having given him, before he left Rome, a ſlow poiſon, he was taken ſo ill at ſea, that he could not bear the motion of the ſhip; ſo that he was brought back to Rome, where he died ſeven days after his return. Acilius Glabrio, who was choſen conſul in his room, was not ſent into Spain, the ſenate not judging him qualified to undertake Dalmatia conquered by the Romans.

[p] Appian. in Illyric. 761. Liv. in epit.

take the re-eſtabliſhment of their affairs in that country.

The Romans penetrate into Tranſalpine Gaul.

As for the conſul Opimius, he penetrated into Tranſalpine Gaul to aſſiſt the inhabitants of Marſeilles, the old friends of Rome, againſt the Ligurians, who had taken from them two cities, Nicæa and Antipolis, defeated not only the Ligurians, but alſo the Deceatæ, who came to their aſſiſtance, and reduced their whole country, which comprehended the preſent territories of Antibes and Graſſe. Such was the firſt conqueſt the Romans made beyond the Alps [q].

It had been long cuſtomary for the conſuls not to enter upon their office till the ides, or fifteenth, of March; but this year, the neceſſity of ſending a conſul into Spain made the Romans aſſemble the comitia for the elections before the uſual time. Q. Fulvius Nobilior and T. Annius Luſcus were promoted to the conſulate, and entered upon their office the firſt day of January, their predeceſſors abdicating to make way for them. From this time to the end of the republic, the firſt of January was always the day for the conſuls to take poſſeſſion of the faſces. The elections being over, Fulvius was ſent with a conſiderable army into Spain, above half that vaſt continent being in a flame. The conſul landed at Tarracon, and from thence marched againſt the Segedani and Aravacæ, who had united their forces to the number of twenty-five thouſand men, under the command of a brave general named Carus. He having laid an ambuſh for the conſul in a wood, ſurpriſed him, and killed ſix thouſand of his legionaries; but purſuing the fugitives with too much ardor into the plain, he was there attacked by the Roman horſe, and killed with ſix thouſand of his men. The battle was fought on the feaſt of Vulcan, a day which the republic ordered to be ever after deemed unlucky, like thoſe on which ſhe had loſt the battles of Ailia, Cannæ, &c. This regulation was chiefly owing to an exceſſive reſentment of the ſenate and people againſt Fulvius. The Spaniards, having aſſembled their forces near Numantia, and choſen two new leaders, came to a ſecond engagement with the Romans; but were defeated by means of ſome elephants ſent by Maſiniſſa; the Spaniards of that country, who had never ſeen any of thoſe huge beaſts, being terrified at the ſight of them. After this victory, the conſul attempted to ſcale the walls of Numantia, whither the enemy had retired; but one of his elephants being wounded, the hideous noiſe it made ſo frightened the others, that they turned upon the Roman legions, and put them into diſorder. The beſieged took advantage of the accident, ſallied out, totally defeated the conſul's troops, and killed four thouſand of them. Fulvius, after this ill ſucceſs and ſome other diſaſters that followed it, not daring to ſeparate his troops, even during the winter, encamped in the field, and, the ſeaſon proving very ſevere, great numbers of his men periſhed with cold, want, and fatigue. The campaign, which the Roman prætor Mummius made in Luſitania, was not much more ſucceſsful. Immediately after his arrival he offered the rebels battle, which they did not decline, being commanded by one Cæſaras, a Luſitanian of great courage and experience in war. The Luſitanians, after a vigorous reſiſtance, were put to flight; but the Romans purſuing them in diſorder, they rallied again, returned to the charge, killed nine thouſand of the prætor's men, took his camp, and plundered it. The Roman army, now reduced to five thouſand men, waited in an advantageous poſt for an opportunity of retrieving their reputation. And indeed they gained ſoon after ſome ſmall advantage over the enemy, cut a detachment of Luſitanians in pieces, and recovered the Roman ſtandards. A poor comfort after ſo great a misfortune! But it raiſed the courage of the Romans, and kept them from deſpairing [r].

The Roman arms unſucceſsful in Spain.

turned

[q] Polyb. legat. 131, 134. Liv. in epit.

THE conſuls for the new year, M. Claudius Marcellus and L. Valerius Flaccus, no ſooner entered upon their office, than the former ſet out for Spain, with eight thouſand foot and five hundred horſe. On his arrival he was attacked by the enemy; but Marcellus, who was an officer of great experience, put them to flight, made a great ſlaughter of the fugitives, and committed dreadful ravages in their country. Hereupon the rebels ſent one of their chief officers to ſue for peace, which Marcellus readily granted them upon very reaſonable terms. The conſul was deſirous of ſettling a general peace in Spain before his conſulſhip expired, that he might on that account be honoured with a triumph on his return to Rome. But the ſenate ſeeing through his deſign, and being likewiſe adviſed by ſome deputies, from two provinces in friendſhip with the Romans, not to grant the peace deſired, they not only refuſed to ratify the articles agreed upon between the conſul and the rebels, but reſolved to purſue the war with more vigour than ever [s].

IN

[r] Appian. in Iberic. c. 286. Strab. l. iii. [s] Polyb. legat. 141. Appian. in Iberic. 281, 287.

Carthage provokes the Romans.

IN the mean time, a war began to break out in Africa. The Carthaginians, being continually haraſſed by the invaſions of Maſiniſſa, and tired out with the injuſtice and partiality of the Roman republic, entered into an alliance with Archobarzanes, the grandſon of Syphax and king of one part of Numidia, engaging him to march with a great army to the frontiers of Maſiniſſa's dominions. Rome looked upon this ſtep as a breach of the treaties between her and the ſtates of Africa, none of which were to take arms without her privity and conſent. Cato on this occaſion diſplayed his hatred to the Carthaginians, and was for immediately declaring war with that republic. But Scipio Naſica, who bore a greater ſway in the ſenate than Cato, prevailed upon the conſcript fathers to have the war deferred, till an embaſſy ſhould be ſent to Carthage, to examine without paſſion into the true ſtate of affairs there. Naſica himſelf was appointed embaſſador for the negotiation he had propoſed. When he came into Africa, he conducted himſelf with great prudence and moderation, and taking upon him the office of mediator between Carthage and Maſiniſſa, he prevailed on the latter to reſtore the lands which had occaſioned the quarrel. Thus all commotions would have been quieted, had not a ſeditious Carthaginian, named Giſgo, a man in office and favour with the people, ſpoke in the public aſſemblies, with great warmth, againſt the peace, which had been juſt negotiated. He, by his ſeditious harangues, ſo inflamed the populace, that they would have offered violence to Naſica, if he had not ſaved himſelf by flight. Upon his retreat, thoſe in the ſenate of Carthage, to the number of forty, who had approved the peace, were condemned to perpetual baniſhment. The Roman ſenate was highly incenſed at the treatment their embaſſador had met with, and Cato much rejoiced to find Naſica at his return agree with him thus far, that Carthage deſerved to be deſtroyed. However, the vengeance of the republic was ſuſpended for ſome time, on account of the war with the revolted Spaniards[t].

WHEN the new conſuls, L. Licinius Lucullus and A. Poſthumius Albinus, were ordered to recruit the legions in Spain, none of the citizens would give in their names, proteſting, that they would not ſerve under the conſul to whoſe lot Spain ſhould fall, even in quality of lieutenants or legionary onary tribunes. The accounts they had received of the hardſhips which the troops under Fulvius had ſuffered, by ſpending a whole winter in the field, diſcouraged them to ſuch a degree, that not one of the Roman youth appeared to enrol themſelves. To encreaſe the misfortune, the tribunes of the people protected thoſe who refuſed to enliſt themſelves, and even went ſo far, as to order the two conſuls to be carried to priſon, for forcing ſome young men into the ſervice. While the ſenate and conſuls were perplexed what methods to take, a young Roman, not above thirty years of age, extricated them out of their difficulties. This was Scipio Æmilianus, the ſon of Paulus Æmilius, and by adoption the grandſon of Scipio Africanus. One day when the people were aſſembled for the enrolments, he deſired leave to ſpeak to them; which being granted, he mounted the roſtra, and made an harangue full of the true Roman ſpirit. The ardor he expreſſed for the ſervice of his country, and his offering to go himſelf into Spain, in what capacity ſoever the conſuls ſhould think fit, had ſuch an effect on the people, that they were now as eager, as they had before been backward, to give in their names. Then the conſuls drew lots for their provinces, when Spain fell to Lucullus, and Ciſalpine Gaul to Poſthumius. It is uncertain, whether Scipio Æmilianus ſerved under Lucullus as one of his lieutenants, or only as a legionary tribune; but whatever was his poſt, he gained all the glory that was acquired during the war. Both Lucullus, who commanded in hither Spain, and the prætor Sulpicius Galba, who commanded in Luſitania, made themſelves infamous by the baſeſt treachery, cruelty, and avarice. The former, finding that his predeceſſor had granted the Celtiberians a peace, went of his own head to make war on the Turduli and Cantabri. Theſe had not given the Romans the leaſt provocation; but Lucullus, who was covetous to exceſs, wanted to reap ſome profits by his conſulſhip. With this view he entered their territories, and committed every where moſt dreadful ravages, putting the inhabitants of whole cities to the ſword, without diſtinction of ſex or age, even after they had ſubmitted upon terms. Æmilianus on this occaſion acquired a high reputation of probity, even among the oppreſſed Spaniards; and as for his bravery, he not only ſlew in ſingle combat a Spaniard of gigantic ſize, who had challenged the boldeſt of the Romans; but was honoured with a mural and civic crown. Lucullus ſoon after ſent him, probably out of jealouſy, into Numidia, under pretence of demanding ſome elephants of Maſiniſſa [u]. The prætor Galba, who was as covetous as Lucullus, and more cruel, penetrated into Luſitania, deſtroyed every thing with fire and ſword, and glutted himſelf with the ſpoils of thoſe unhappy people. We are told, that he cruelly maſſacred above thirty thouſand Luſitanians, after he had ſolemnly promiſed them both their life and liberty, and by that means prevailed upon them to deliver up their arms. Neither the conſul Lucullus nor the prætor Galba were ſo much as accuſed before the ſenate or people, for theſe unjuſt and inhuman proceedings. The Romans were ſo prejudiced againſt the Spaniards, that they ſeem to have authoriſed the cruelties and injuſtice of their generals [w].

[t] Appian. in Punic. Plut. in Catone. Liv. in epit.

The cruelty of the Romans in Spain.

In the mean time, Guluſſa, the ſon of Maſiniſſa, arriving at Rome, confirmed the accounts which the ſenate had received from ſeveral quarters, that preparations were making at Carthage for an open declaration of war with the republic. Cato immediately laid hold of this occaſion to repeat the words he had ſo often uttered; There is no ſafety for Rome, till Carthage is deſtroyed. But the advice of Scipio Naſica ſtill prevailed; and at his motion deputies were ſent into Africa, to inform themſelves upon the ſpot of the preparations the Carthaginians were making by ſea and land. The deputies on their return reported, that Carthage had undoubtedly a deſign to make war in ſome other place than the continent of Africa; that her fleet was numerous and well equipped; and that ſhe had on foot a formidable army. But, notwithſtanding theſe appearances, and all the eloquence of Cato, Naſica had influence enough over the ſenate to ſuſpend the decree againſt the Carthaginians [x].

A war breaks out between Carthage and Maſiniſſa.

In the following conſulate of T. Quinctius Flaminius and M. Acilius Balbus, a bloody war broke out between Carthage and Maſiniſſa. The Numidian king, though now almoſt ninety years of age, to revenge an affront offered by the Carthaginians to his two ſons, Guluſſa and Micipſa, put himſelf at the head of a powerful army, and laid ſiege to Oroſcopa, a city ſubject to the Carthaginian republic. Hereupon Carthage ſent out a conſiderable number of troops, under the command of Aſdrubal, to relieve the place. In ſeveral ſkirmiſhes the Numidians had always the diſadvantage; whereupon Maſiniſſa, who had learnt the art of war under the great Scipio, pretending fear, retired before [u] Appian. in Iberic. Vell. Paterc.

[w] Appian. ibid.
[x] Appian. in Punic.

before the enemy, and by degrees drew them into a place, where he had all the advantage he could wiſh for. Here he halted with a deſign to give the enemy battle. While he was preparing for a general engagement, news was brought him, that Scipio Æmilianus was come from Spain into Africa, to deſire, in the name of Lucullus, ſome elephants to be employed againſt the revolted Spaniards. Though Æmilianus was only the grandſon of Africanus by adoption, yet, upon the bare name of Scipio, the old king's affection and gratitude for a family, to which he owed his grandeur, revived. He would have gone in perſon to meet the Roman, if he had not been engaged in preparing for the battle, which was to be fought the next day, the two armies, each of them above fifty thouſand ſtrong, being encamped over againſt each other. However, he ſent his two ſons, with all his cavalry, to receive and eſcort him. When he arrived in the camp, Maſiniſſa ran to embrace him with great tenderneſs, and could not refrain from tears, in mentioning his old benefactor Scipio Africanus. He attended him all over the camp, acquainted him with the preparations he was making againſt the next day's engagement, and made the flower of his troops paſs in review before him. Æmilianus was highly pleaſed with this ſight; but the chief object of his ſurpriſe and admiration was the king himſelf. His great age had neither abated the vigour of his mind nor the ſtrength of his body, ſo as to render him unable to ſuſtain military labours. He mounted and diſmounted his horſe with the activity of a young man. He rid, after the Numidian manner, without a ſaddle, and continued all day, and ſometimes all night, on horſeback. He had no better proviſions than the meaneſt of his ſoldiers. In ſhort, Maſiniſſa, as Æmilianus ſaid on his return to Rome, was not old in any reſpect, but his long experience in buſineſs and arms. As Rome had not yet openly broken with Carthage, the next morning Æmilianus retired from Maſiniſſa's camp, not thinking it lawful for him to have any ſhare in the action, and poſted himſelf on the top of an eminence, whence he ſaw very diſtinctly one of the greateſt battles that had ever been fought in Africa. It laſted from the riſing of the ſun till night; both parties performed great exploits, and the victory was long in ſuſpenſe; but at length declared for Maſiniſſa. Then Æmilianus came down from his eminence, returned to the camp of the conqueror, and congratulated him on his victory. Maſiniſſa, on this joyful occaſion, gave the Roman the ſincereſt proofs of an inviolable

The Carthaginians defeated by Maſiniſſa.

violable attachment to his republic and eſteem for his family, granted him the elephants he demanded, and kept him with him as long as he could [y]. As this victory was not deciſive, Æmilianus undertook to negotiate a peace between the two parties. But, his mediation proving ineffectual, hoſtilities renewed with more animoſity than ever. After many ſlight battles, Maſiniſſa ſo blocked up the Carthaginian camp, that no convoys could be brought to it, or detachments ſent out without great difficulty. The Carthaginian army which was very numerous, having now no communication with the country, was ſoon reduced to the laſt extremity. At firſt they lived upon the fleſh of their horſes, and then boiled the harneſſes of their carriages, burning their bucklers and the ſhafts of their ſpears for want of wood. The famine produced a plague, which carried off more men than they had loſt in all the engagements. In this extremity Aſdrubal yielded to all the conditions of peace, which the Numidians thought fit to impoſe upon him. Among other things, Maſiniſſa obliged all the Carthaginians to paſs under the yoke, unarmed and half naked. Theſe unhappy wretches, thus branded with ignominy, and ſo weak that they could ſcarce ſtand, comforted themſelves at leaſt with hopes of ſeeing their native country again. But revenge inſpired Guluſſa with a very cruel reſolution. The Carthaginians had formerly laid an ambuſh to ſurpriſe him and his brother Micipſa, on their return from Carthage to Numidia, and, falling upon them, had on that occaſion killed ſome of their attendants. This Guluſſa remembered; and, to revenge one perfidious act with another, let looſe the Numidian horſe on the diſarmed multitude. Whether Maſiniſſa was privy to his ſon's treachery, was never known. But however that be, the Numidian horſe coming up with thoſe unhappy men, who, being exhauſted with hunger and diſtempers, had neither courage enough to reſiſt, nor ſtrength to fly, butchered them like ſo many victims; ſo that of fifty-eight thouſand men only Aſdrubal, and ſome other officers of diſtinction, eſcaped the general maſſacre. The Romans had ſent embaſſadors into Africa, under pretence of putting an end to the differences between Carthage and Numidia, in an amicable manner. But they had private inſtructions to take upon them the office of mediators, only in caſe Maſiniſſa was defeated. If that prince ſhould happen to get the better, their their directions were to encourage him to puſh the Carthaginians to the utmoſt extremity, which they did accordingly; and then, taking advantage of the prodigious loſs the Carthaginians had ſuſtained, deferred no longer to declare war againſt them, though they ſent an embaſſy to Rome, offering all kinds of ſubmiſſion, and even leaving it to the ſenate to propoſe their own terms [z].

The Carthaginians treacherouſly maſſacred by Guluſſa.

[y] Idem ibid.

The third Punic war.

As ſoon as the new conſuls, L. Marcius Cenſorinus and M. Manilius Nepos, entered upon their office, they cauſed the war with Carthage to be proclaimed in the comitia of the people, and then drew lots for their provinces, the command of the fleet falling to Marcius, and that of the land-forces to Manilius. When all things were ready for their expedition into Africa, embaſſadors arrived at Rome from the people of Utica, offering to ſurrender up their city to the republic, and deſiring to be admitted into an alliance with Rome. The Carthaginians, terrified at the defection of ſo powerful a city, and the great preparations which were making at Rome, reſolved to avert the impending ſtorm, by yielding themſelves and their dominions to the Romans by way of dedition; which was to give them an abſolute authority over every thing in the country, their cities, lands, rivers, temples, &c. and likewiſe over all the inhabitants, of what rank ſoever, ſex, or condition. The embaſſadors, who came to Rome to make this abſolute ſurrender, were well received by the ſenate, and told, that ſince they had done all that could be required of them, they ſhould enjoy their lands, effects, laws, and liberty as before, upon condition, that they ſent three hundred hoſtages to the conſuls, who were now in Sicily, and put in execution what they ſhould think fit to command them. The embaſſadors, overjoyed at this unexpected ſucceſs, took their leave of the ſenate, and flew to Carthage with the good news. Moſt of the Carthaginian ſenators cried up the moderation of the Romans; but ſome began to ſuſpect, that Rome concealed ſome artifice under this appearance of clemency. However, a decree paſſed, commanding three hundred hoſtages to be ſent to Lilybœum, where the Roman fleet lay at anchor. The conſuls, having ſent them on board a ſquadron to Italy, immediately ſet ſail for Utica, and there landed their troops to the number of ſeventy-four thouſand men, horſe and foot. As ſoon as the troops were landed, Manilius went to take poſſeſſion of the ſame ground, on which the great Scipio had encamped, when he inveſted Carthage. It is eaſy to judge of the conſternation the Carthaginians were in, when they beheld ſo terrible an army in their neighbourhood, and were at the ſame time informed, that war had been declared againſt them, notwithſtanding the ſubmiſſions they had made. They ſent deputies to the conſuls, to expoſtulate with them and to learn their intentions. The Roman generals received them with extraordinary pomp and magnificence. They ordered all their ſoldiers to ſtand to their arms; and the deputies paſſed through two long lines of men, drawn up on each ſide of them, colours flying, and were conducted, by ſound of military inſtruments, from the gate of the camp to the conſul's quarters. There the two collegues received them, ſitting upon two high thrones, and ſurrounded by their chief officers, who were divided from the croud by a bar, within which the embaſſadors themſelves were not ſuffered to enter. As ſoon as the noiſe of the trumpets ceaſed, the head of the embaſſy made a long ſpeech, in which he complained of Rome for ſending an army into Africa, after the Carthaginians had delivered up their eſtates, lands, and poſſeſſions to the Roman ſenate at diſcretion. In the cloſe of his ſpeech, he deſired the conſuls, in a moſt ſubmiſſive manner, to acquaint him with the real intentions of the ſenate. Marcius anſwered, that he would gradually communicate to them the orders he had received, beginning with that which required moſt diſpatch; and then added, ſince you are under the protection of Rome, and ſincerely deſire peace, what occaſion have you for that vaſt number of arms with which your magazines are filled? Bring them hither, and thereby give us a freſh proof, that your love of peace is not feigned. The embaſſadors, ſtunned with this demand, knew not at firſt what to anſwer. But at length, recollecting themſelves, remonſtrated to the conſul, that Carthage had other enemies to contend with beſides the Romans; and therefore could not ſafely be without arms; that ſhe was in danger of being attacked by Aſdrubal, who, being condemned to die for having offended Rome by his late war with Maſiniſſa, had made his eſcape, and drawn together an army of twenty thouſand men. To this the conſul briſkly replied, Be eaſy, Carthaginians; Rome will provide for your ſafety. Obey, and be in no concern about any thing elſe. What could they do but ſubmit? Carthage wanted the neceſſary ſtores of proviſions to ſuſtain a ſiege;

The Carthaginians yield themſelves and their dominians to the Romans.

[z] Idem ibid.

ſiege; and had neither auxiliaries nor mercenaries; all the flower of her youth had been deſtroyed in the late battle with Maſiniſſa; her fleet was not fitted out, and that of the Romans was ſtronger and barred up the harbour. The Carthaginians therefore, without any fraud, delivered up their arms and engines of war to the Roman quæſtors ſent to Carthage for that purpoſe. The Romans were ſurpriſed, when they ſaw the long train of carts, loaded with arms, which were brought to the camp by the Carthaginians themſelves. Some hiſtorians ſay, they were ſufficient to have armed all Africa. At leaſt it is certain, that there were put into the conſul's hands two thouſand catapultæ, two hundred thouſand complete ſuits of armour, and an infinite number of ſwords, darts, javelins, arrows, and of beams armed with iron, which were thrown from the ramparts by the baliſtæ. This convoy of arms was attended by the moſt venerable old men and the prieſts in their ſacred attire, who were well qualified by their character and age to mollify the Romans. The conſuls received them ſitting on their tribunal; and Marcius, who had more eloquence than his collegue, putting on a ſerious and majeſtic air, addreſſed himſelf to them thus: We are well pleaſed with theſe firſt inſtances of your obedience, and therefore cannot help congratulating you upon them. I have now but one thing more to require of you in the name of the Roman people. I will therefore, without further preample, plainly declare to you an order, on which the ſafety of your republic, the preſervation of your goods, your lives, and liberty depend. Rome requires, that you abandon your city, which we are commanded to level with the ground. You may build yourſelves another where you pleaſe, provided it be ten miles from the ſea, and without walls or fortifications. A little courage and reſolution will get the better of the affection, which attaches us to our old habitations, and is founded more in habit than in reaſon. At theſe words the Carthaginian deputies were thunderſtruck. Some of them ſwooned away: others expreſſed their ſorrow in cries and lamentations; and all were in the utmoſt conſternation. Even the Roman ſoldiers were affected with ſo moving a ſight; but the conſuls, without ſhewing the leaſt concern, Theſe ſudden fits, ſaid they, wear off by degrees; time and neceſſity teach the moſt unfortunate to bear their calamities with patience. The Carthaginians, when they recover their ſenſes, will chuſe to obey. While the others, in the height of their grief, rage,

They deliver up their arms to the Romans.

The Roman conſuls command the Carthaginians to demoliſh their city.

and deſpair, were uttering imprecations againſt the Romans, one Hanno, a venerable old man, and more compoſed than the reſt, endeavoured in a long ſpeech to move the conſuls to compaſſion, and concluded by earneſtly entreating them at leaſt to allow the Carthaginians time to make freſh applications to the ſenate of Rome. But the conſuls were inflexible; they would neither recede from the ſentence they had paſſed, nor ſuſpend the execution of it. The deputies returned to Carthage, and made their report; and then the whole city was nothing but horror and confuſion. The people, as actuated by ſo many furies, broke into the ſenate-houſe, and vented their rage on thoſe who had adviſed the giving of hoſtages, and the delivering up the arms, which they now wanted for their defence. They did not ſpare even the deputies themſelves; but dragged them through the ſtreets with ignominy, as inauſpicious meſſengers. However, among this great number of raving people, a few, leſs tranſported than the reſt, acted with ſome appearance of reaſon. They took care to ſhut the gates of the city, and gathered together on the ramparts great heaps of ſtones to ſerve them inſtead of other arms in caſe of a ſurpriſe. At length, when the firſt commotion was a little abated, the ſenators aſſembled, and reſolved to ſuſtain a ſiege. They were ſtripped of their arms and deſtitute of proviſions; but deſpair raiſed their courage, and made them find out expedients. They began with taking the malefactors out of priſon, giving the ſlaves their liberty, and incorporating them in the militia. Then a pardon was granted to Aſdrubal, who had been ſentenced to die only to pleaſe the Romans; and he was invited to employ the twenty thouſand men he had raiſed, in the defence of his country. Another Aſdrubal was appointed to command in Carthage; and all ſeemed reſolute, either to ſave their city, or periſh in its ruins. They wanted arms; but what cannot deſpair compaſs? By order of the ſenate, the temples, porticos, and all public buildings, were turned into work-houſes, where men and women were continually employed in making arms. As they encouraged one another in their work, and loſt no time in procuring to themſelves the neceſſaries of life, which were brought to them at ſtated hours, they every day made an hundred and forty-four bucklers, three hundred ſwords, a thouſand darts, and five hundred lances and javelins. As to baliſtæ and catapultæ, they wanted proper materials for them; but their induſtry ſupplied that defect. Where iron iron and braſs were wanting, they made uſe of gold and ſilver, melting down the ſtatues, vaſes, and even the utenſils of private families; for on this occaſion the moſt covetous became liberal. As tow and flax were wanting to make cords for working the machines, the women, even thoſe of the firſt rank, freely cut off their hair, and joyfully dedicated to that uſe the fineſt ornament of their heads. Without the walls Aſdrubal employed the troops under his command in getting together proviſions, and conveying them ſafe into Carthage; ſo that there was as great plenty there as in the Roman camp [a].

The Carthaginians reſolve to ſuſtain a ſiege.

In the mean time, the conſuls delayed drawing near to Carthage, not doubting, but the inhabitants, whom they imagined deſtitute of neceſſaries to ſuſtain a ſiege, would upon cool reflection ſubmit; and this delay coſt the Romans many battles and much blood. At length, finding themſelves deceived in their expectation, they came before the place and inveſted it. As they were ſtill perſuaded, that the Carthaginians had no arms, they flattered themſelves that they ſhould eaſily take the place by aſſault. Accordingly, they approached the walls, in order to plant their ſcaling ladders; and then, to their great ſurpriſe, they diſcovered a prodigious multitude of men on the ramparts, ſhining in the armour they had newly made. The legionaries were ſo terrified at this unexpected ſight, that they drew back and would have retired, if the conſuls had not led them on to the attack; which, however, proved unſucceſsful, the Romans, in ſpite of their utmoſt efforts, being obliged to give over the enterpriſe, and lay aſide all thoughts of taking Carthage by aſſault. In the mean time, Aſdrubal, having drawn together from all places ſubject to Carthage, a prodigious number of troops, came and encamped within reach of the Romans, and ſoon reduced them to great ſtreights for want of proviſions, their parties not daring to venture out of the camp to forage, for fear of the Carthaginian cavalry, which was ſuperior to that of the Romans. As Marcius was poſted near a marſh, for the two conſuls encamped ſeparately, the exhalations of the ſtagnating waters and the heat of the ſeaſon infected the air, and cauſed a general ſickneſs among his men. Marcius therefore ordered his fleet to draw as near the ſhore as poſſible to receive his troops, and tranſport them to a healthier place, but ſtill within reach of Carthage. Aſdrubal, who commanded

The Romans repulſed in the firſt attack.

[a] Liv. in epit. Polyb. legat. 142. Appian. in Plin.

commanded in the city, having notice of this motion, ordered all the old barks in the harbour to be filled with faggots, tow, ſulphur, bitumen, and other combuſtible materials; and then, taking advantage of the wind, which blew towards the enemy, let them drive upon their ſhips, which were for the moſt part conſumed. After this diſaſter, Marcius was called home to preſide at the elections, and Manilius ordered to continue the war in Africa. The Carthaginians, looking upon the removal of one of the conſuls as a happy preſage of their ſpeedy deliverance, made a briſk ſally in the night, and would have ſurpriſed the conſul's camp, had not Æmilianus, with ſome ſquadrons, marched out of the gate oppoſite to the place where the attack was made, and, riding full ſpeed round the camp, attacked the enemy, who expected nothing leſs, in the rear, and obliged them to return in diſorder into the city. Aſdrubal had poſted himſelf under the walls of a city, named Nepheris, but twenty-four miles diſtant from Carthage, and ſituated on a high mountain, which ſeemed inacceſſible on all ſides. From thence the Carthaginian general made incurſions into the neighbouring country, intercepted the Roman convoys, fell upon their detachments ſent out to forage, and even ordered parties to inſult the conſular army in their camp. Hereupon the conſul reſolved to drive Aſdrubal from this advantageous poſt, and, contrary to the opinion of Æmilianus, who was well appriſed of the difficulty of the enterpriſe, ſet out on his march for Nepheris. As he drew near the hills, Aſdrubal all on a ſudden appeared at the head of his army in order of battle, and fell upon the Romans with incredible fury. The conſular army ſuſtained the attack with great reſolution, and Aſdrubal retired in good order to his former poſt, hoping the Romans would attack him there. But the conſul, being now convinced, that his deſign could not be purſued without endangering the whole army, reſolved to retire; and accordingly began to march back. This Aſdrubal no ſooner perceived, than he came down from the mountains, like a torrent, and falling upon the enemy's rear, cut a great many of them in pieces. All authors agree, that the whole army would have been loſt, if it had not been for the bravery and prudent conduct of Scipio Æmilianus, who, being at this time only a legionary tribune, renewed the famous exploit of Horatius Cocles. At the head of three hundred horſe he ſuſtained the attack of all the forces commanded by Aſdrubal, and covered the legions, while they paſſed

Part of the Roman fleet deſtroyed.

Scipio Æmilianus ſaves the Roman army.

paſſed a river in their retreat before the enemy. Then he and his companions threw themſelves into the ſtream, and ſwam croſs it. The Romans loſt in this raſh enterpriſe a great number of men, and among the reſt three legionary tribunes, who had been the moſt ſanguine in promoting it, contrary to the opinion of Æmilianus. When the Romans had croſſed the river, they perceived that four manipuli were wanting, and were ſoon after informed, that theſe brave men, being ſurrounded on all ſides by the enemy, had poſted themſelves on an eminence, reſolved at leaſt to ſell their lives dear. This news raiſed the compaſſion of Æmilianus, who taking with him a choſen body of horſe and proviſions for two days, returned croſs the river, and flew to the deliverance of his countrymen. He ſeized a hill over-againſt that on which the four manipuli were poſted, and after ſome hours repoſe marched againſt the Carthaginians, who kept them inveſted, fell upon them at the head of his ſquadron with the boldneſs of a man who was determined to die or conquer, and in ſpite of all oppoſition, opened a way for his fellow-citizens to eſcape. On his return to the camp, the ſoldiers, who had given him for loſt, carried him to his quarters in a kind of triumph; and the manipuli he had ſaved gave him a crown of gramen or graſs, gathered on the ſpot where he had ſignalized his valor, which was deemed more honourable than the richeſt preſents. By theſe and many other glorious exploits, Æmilianus in this unfortunate campaign gained ſuch reputation, that Cato, who is ſaid never to have commended any body before, could not refuſe the young tribune the praiſes he deſerved, which, however, he mixed, after his uſual manner, with ſevere reflections on the other officers of the army in Africa. This rigid philoſopher died ſoon after, at the age of eighty-four or eighty-five: he is ſaid to have foretold, before he expired, that Carthage would never be reduced, till Scipio Æmilianus was employed in that expedition [b].

The Roman arms unſucceſsful in Spain.

In Spain, the Roman arms were yet more unſucceſsful than in Africa. The prætor Vetilius, who commanded ten thouſand men in the further province, loſt four thouſand of them in a battle againſt the Luſitanians, under the conduct of one Viriathus, who was firſt a famous hunter, afterwards a captain of banditti, and at laſt a commander in chief of the Luſitanian rebels. The prætor himſelf was taken taken priſoner; but the ſoldier who took him, ſeeing him old and fancying no body would purchaſe him, killed him without knowing who he was. Upon the news of this diſaſter, the republic immediately ſent C. Plautius into Spain, with a reinforcement of ten thouſand foot and thirteen hundred horſe. Theſe, being joined by great numbers of Spaniards, who continued faithful to the republic, made a formidable army. But Viriathus, after having cut in pieces by a ſtratagem a detachment of four thouſand Romans, ventured to engage them in a pitched battle, which he conducted with ſuch dexterity, that the prætorian army was entirely defeated, and forced to ſhut themſelves up all the ſummer in the neghbouring cities; ſo that the brave Luſitanian, being now maſter of the field, laid the whole country under contribution [c].

[b] Liv. ibid. Plut. in Cat. Appian in Punic.

Macedon revolts.

THESE were not the only loſſes the republic ſuſtained this year. In Macedon one Andriſcus, who pretended to be the ſon of Perſes by one of his miſtreſſes, and had taken the name of Philip, being aſſiſted by the Thracians, obliged the Macedonians to own him for their king, and conquered part of Theſſaly. Scipio Naſica, whom the ſenate ſent into Greece to learn the true ſtate of affairs, by the aſſiſtance of the Achæans, drove the falſe Philip out of Theſſaly. But the prætor Juventius Thalna, who ſucceeded Naſica, having attempted to force his way through the narrow paſſes into Macedon, loſt in that raſh undertaking both his life and the legion he commanded. By this means Philip reduced all Theſſaly, and ſettled himſelf on the throne of Macedon.

AT Rome, Sp. Poſthumius Albinus Magnus and L. Calpurnius Piſo Cæſonius being choſen conſuls for the new year, the conduct of the war in Africa fell by lot to the latter. But, as he did not haſten to his province, Manilius, who continued to command the army in quality of proconſul, endeavoured to repair the faults he had commited during his conſulate. He frequently ſent out Æmilianus with ſtrong parties to pillage the neighbouring country, and intercept the enemy's convoys, and the tribune was always attended with uncommon ſucceſs. He took ſeveral caſtles, and among the reſt Tezaga, a place of great ſtrength. In one of theſe expeditions he found means to have a private conference with one Phameas, general under Aſdrubal of the Carthaginian cavalry, and brought him over over together with two thouſand two hundred of his horſe to the Roman intereſt. Phameas was an able commander, who, by his bravery and ſkill in war, had exceedingly diſtreſſed the Roman army; ſo that the gaining of his friendſhip was reckoned an important acquiſition. The proconſul ſent him ſoon after with Æmilianus to Rome, to receive the honours and rewards he deſerved from the republic. At the ſame time, Manlius wrote a letter to the ſenate, wherein he acknowledged himſelf indebted to Æmilianus for whatever ſucceſſes he had met with during the campaign [d].

Æmilianus gains over the general of the Carthaginian cavalry.

[c] Appian. in Iberic.

In the mean time, the conſul Calpurnius Piſo and the prætor Mancinus arrived in Africa, the former to command the land-forces, and the other the fleet. Theſe two generals formed a very different plan for the campaign from that of Marcius and Manilius. For, inſtead of purſuing the ſiege of the capital, they applied themſelves wholly to the reducing of ſome other cities on the African coaſt, which they attacked both by ſea and land. They firſt inveſted Clupea, but were obliged to abandon the enterpriſe with ſhame and confuſion, the inhabitants having in ſeveral ſallies killed great numbers of their men. From Clupea the conſul went to vent his rage on a city newly built and thence called Neapolis, which profeſſed a ſtrict neutrality, and even had a ſafeguard from the Romans. However, the conſul plundered the place, and ſtript the inhabitants of all their effects. After this he laid ſiege to Hippagreta, which employed the Roman fleet and army the whole ſummer. When the winter drew near, the conſul raiſed the ſiege, and returned with his fleet and army to Utica, without having performed one valiant action during the whole campaign. In the mean time, the Carthaginians ſent deputies to the new king of Macedon, encouraging him to continue the war againſt Rome. But the prætor Q. Cæcilius Metellus, who now commanded the Roman forces in Macedon, having defeated this mock king in two pitched battles, obliged him to ſhelter himſelf in the court of one of the petty kings of Thrace, who afterwards delivered him up to the Romans. He was ſcarce reduced, when another impoſtor ſtarted up, who called himſelf Alexander, and pretended likewiſe to be the ſon of Perſes. But, as his followers were rather a confuſed rabble than an army, army, they were eaſily diſperſed, as we have related at length in the hiſtory of Macedon.

Macedon reconquered.

[d] Appian in Punic. Oroſ. l. iv. c. 11. Zonar. l. ix.

Scipio Æmilianus choſen conſul.

AND now, the time of the elections drawing near, the people, conſidering that the republic wanted great generals, reſolved to have regard to nothing but merit; and as Scipio Æmilianus was, in their opinion, the only man who could retrieve the reputation of the Roman arms in Africa, they diſpenſed with the Villian law in his favour, which required every candidate for the conſulſhip to be forty-three years old, and raiſed him to the conſular dignity at the age of thirty-ſeven. Neither would they ſuffer him to draw lots with his collegue, C. Livius Druſus, for the conduct of the Carthaginian war; but appointed him by a ſpecial decree to ſucceed Piſo. The new conſul immediately ſet ſail for Sicily, taking on board with him Polybius the hiſtorian, for whom he had a great eſteem, and Lælius, whom he appointed his lieutenant-general. This Lælius was the ſon of the other, whom Scipio Africanus had ſo tenderly loved, and Æmilianus, in imitation of that hero, entered into as ſtrict a friendſhip with Lælius the ſon, as the firſt Scipio had done with the father. It is ſaid, that Æmilianus and his friend Lælius were the authors of the comedies, which are commonly aſcribed to the poet Terence. With Polybius and Lælius Æmilianus he ſet ſail from Sicily, and entered the port of Utica, with his fleet, under the command of the prætor Serranus, when three thouſand five hundred of the Roman army were in imminent danger of being cut in pieces before Carthage. Theſe, during Piſo's abſence, who had penetrated far into the inland country with his army, had ſeized Megalia, one of the ſuburbs of the city. But, as they had not furniſhed themſelves with proviſions to ſubſiſt there, and could not retire, being cloſely inveſted on all ſides by the enemy's troops, the prætor Mancinus, who commanded this detachment, ſeeing the danger, into which he had brought himſelf, diſpatched in the duſk of the evening a light boat to Utica, to acquaint the Romans there with his danger.

He arrives in Africa.

The meſſenger delivered the prætor's letter to the new conſul, who had landed his troops a few hours before. Æmilianus immediately flew to the relief of the inveſted Romans, obliged the Carthaginians to retire within their walls, and putting the three thouſand five hundred men on board his ſhips, conveyed them ſafe to Utica. He then diſpatched a meſſenger to Piſo to inform him of his arrival, and to order him to draw near to Carthage with his army. The proconſul proconſul obeyed, and Æmilianus, having taken upon him the command of the troops, applied himſelf wholly to the taking of Carthage alone, as the only means to reduce at once the African republic. His firſt attack was upon Megalia, which he carried by aſſault, the Carthaginian garriſon retiring into the citadel of Byrſa. Megalia taken. Aſdrubal, who had commanded the forces of the republic in the field, and was now governor of Carthage, was ſo enraged at the loſs of Megalia, that he cauſed all the Roman captives, taken in the two years the war had laſted, to be brought upon the ramparts, and to be thrown headlong, in the ſight of the Roman army, from the top of the wall, after having, with an exceſs of cruelty, commanded their hands and feet to be cut off, and their eyes and tongues to be torn out. As he was of a temper remarkably inhuman, he is ſaid to have taken pleaſure in ſeeing ſome of thoſe unhappy men flayed alive. While Aſdrubal was thus venting his rage on the Roman captives, the conſul was buſy in drawing lines of circumvallation and contravallation, croſs the neck of land, which joined the iſthmus, whereon Carthage ſtood, to the continent. By this means all the avenues on the land-ſide to Carthage being ſhut up, the city could receive no proviſions that way. Carthage blocked up by ſea and land. His next care was to raiſe a mole in the ſea in order to block up the old port, the new port being already ſhut up by the Roman fleet; and this great work he effected with immenſe labour. The mole reached from the weſtern neck of land, of which the Romans were maſters, to the entrance of the port, and was ninety foot broad at the bottom and eighty at the top. The beſieged, when the Romans firſt began this ſurpriſing work, laughed at the attempt; but were no leſs alarmed than ſurpriſed, when, contrary to their expectation, they beheld a vaſt mole appearing above water, the continent carried a great way into the ſea, and by that means the port rendered inacceſſible to ſhips and quite uſeleſs. And now emulation and deſpair prompted the Carthaginians to attempt and execute what ſeemed altogether impoſſible, and would appear utterly incredible, if it were not atteſted by the hiſtorian, who has given us the moſt particular account of the ſiege of Carthage [e]. With miraculous and incredible induſtry they in a ſhort time dug a new baſon, and cut a paſſage into the ſea, by which they could receive the proviſions that were ſent them by their troops in the field. The beſieged dig a new baſon, and build a fleet. With the ſame ſame diligence and expedition they built and fitted out a fleet of fifty triremes, which, to the great ſurpriſe of the Romans, appeared ſuddenly, advancing into the ſea through this new canal, and even ventured to give the enemy battle. The action laſted the whole day, and was glorious both for the beſieged and the beſiegers, little advantage being gained on either ſide. The day after the engagement, the conſul attempted to make himſelf maſter of a terraſs, which covered the city on the ſide next the ſea; and on this occaſion the beſieged ſignalized their reſolution in the moſt remarkable manner. Great numbers of them naked and unarmed went into the water in the dead of the night, with unlighted torches in their hands, and having, partly by ſwimming, partly by wading, got within reach of the Roman engines, they ſtruck fire, lighted their torches, and threw them with fury againſt the machines. The ſudden appearance of theſe naked men, who looked like ſo many monſters ſtarted up out of the ſea, terrified the Romans, who guarded the machines, to ſuch a degree, that they began to retire in the utmoſt confuſion. The conſul, who commanded this detachment in perſon, and had continued all night at the foot of the terraſs, endeavoured to ſtop his men, and even ordered thoſe who fled to be killed. But the Carthaginians, perceiving the confuſion the Romans were in, threw themſelves on them like ſo many wild beaſts, and having put them to flight only with their torches, they ſet fire to the machines, and entirely conſumed them. This, however, did not diſcourage the conſul; he renewed the attack a few days after, carried the terraſs by aſſault, and lodged four thouſand men upon it. As this was an important poſt, becauſe it pent Carthage in on the ſea-ſide, Æmilianus took great care to fortify and ſecure it againſt the ſallies of the enemy; and then, winter approaching, he ſuſpended all further attacks upon the place, till the return of good weather [f].

[e] Appian. in Punic. N. 75.

A bold and ſucceſsful attempt of the Carthaginians.

ÆMILIANUS did not continue idle in his trenches during the cold ſeaſon. The Carthaginians had a very numerous army, under the command of one Diogenes, ſtrongly encamped near Nepheris, whence convoys of proviſions were ſent by ſea to the beſieged, and brought into the new baſon. To take Nepheris therefore was to deprive Carthage of her chief chief magazine. This Æmilianus undertook, and ſucceeded in the attempt; for he firſt forced the enemy's entrenchment, put ſeventy thouſand of them to the ſword, and made ten thouſand priſoners, all the inhabitants of the country, who could not retire to Carthage, having taken refuge in this camp. After this the conſul laid ſiege to Nepheris, which was protracted longer than he expected. However, Æmilianus made himſelf maſter of this important place, after he had been twenty-two days before it. In this enterpriſe the Romans were greatly aſſiſted by a body of Numidian horſe, under the command of Guluſſa, who had ſucceeded his father Maſiniſſa in the kingdom of Numidia. Maſiniſſa himſelf had lent the Romans no aſſiſtance in this war, being juſtly piqued at their having undertaken it, without imparting their deſign to him. Aſdrubal, being diſheartened by the defeat of the army, and touched with the miſery of the beſieged, now reduced to the utmoſt extremity for want of proviſions, offered in the name of the Carthaginians to ſubmit to what conditions the Romans pleaſed, provided they would only ſpare the city. But the conſul abſolutely refuſing to recede from his inſtructions with regard to the demolition of Carthage, Aſdrubal, aſſuming the air and geſture of a bully, No, ſaid he, no, the ſun ſhall never ſee Carthage deſtroyed, and Aſdrubal alive [g].

[f] Liv. in epit. Appian in Punic. N. 78. Polyb. in excerpt. apud Valeſium.

Æmilianus forces the entrenchments of the Carthaginians.

In the mean time, the conſular year being expired, the republic choſe C. Cornelius Lentulus and L. Mummius conſuls. But Æmilianus was continued general of the army in Africa, till ſuch time as he ſhould finiſh the great work he had undertaken. Early in the ſpring, he renewed the ſiege of Carthage; and, in order to open himſelf a way into the city, he ordered Lælius to attempt the reduction of Cotho, a ſmall iſland, which divided the two ports. The proconſul himſelf made a falſe attack on the citadel, in order to draw the enemy thither. This ſtratagem had the deſired effect; for the citadel, known by the name of Byrſa, being a place of the utmoſt importance, moſt of the Carthaginians haſtened thither, and made their utmoſt efforts to repulſe the aggreſſors. But, in the mean time, Lælius, having with incredible expedition, built a wooden bridge over the channel, which divided Cotho from the iſthmus, entered the iſland, ſcaled the walls of the fortreſs which the Carthaginians had built there, and made himſelf maſter of that important poſt. The proconſul, [g] Liv. Appian. & Polyb. ibid.

The iſland of Cotho taken by the Romans, and one of the gates of the city.

conſul, who was engaged before Byrſa, no ſooner underſtood by the great ſhout the Romans gave, that they had got poſſeſſion of Cotho, than he abandoned the falſe attack, and unexpectedly fell on the neighbouring gate of the city, which he broke down, notwithſtanding the ſhowers of darts that were inceſſantly diſcharged upon his men from the ramparts. As night coming on prevented the proconſul from proceeding farther, he made a lodgment within the gate, and waited there for the return of day, with a deſign to advance through the city to the citadel, and attack it on that ſide, which was but indifferently fortified. Purſuant to this deſign, at day-break he ordered four thouſand freſh troops to be ſent him from his camp; but did not think it lawful to proceed in the attempt, till he had performed a religious ceremony, then practiſed by the Romans before the taking and ſacking of great cities. This was to evocate the tutelary gods of the place, that is, to entreat them to abandon a place which was unworthy of their preſence and protection. When this ceremony was over, the proconſul ſolemnly devoted the inhabitants of Carthage to death and to the gods of hell, in theſe words: O formidable Pluto, and ye infernal Manes, let looſe againſt the Carthaginian people fear, terror and vengeance. Let the nations and cities, which have taken up arms againſt us, be overcome and deſtroyed. I devote and deliver up to you, Furies, all the enemies of my republic, in my own name, and in the name of the ſenate and people of Rome. But as for our legions and auxiliary troops, guard them from death and the accidents of war.

THE proconſul had no ſooner performed this ceremony, than he began to advance at the head of his men through the ſtreets of the city, in order to attack the citadel. Polybius the hiſtorian, who marched by his ſide, adviſed him to throw caltrops and planks full of nails with the points upwards in the ſtreets through which he paſſed, to prevent his being ſurpriſed in the rear. But the brave general replied, You are over cautious, Polybius; there is nothing to be feared from a city, which is full of confuſion, and already taken. This ſaid, he advanced to the market-place, from whence three exceeding ſteep ſtreets led to the citadel. The houſes on both ſides were very high, and filled with Carthaginians, who overwhelmed the Romans, as they advanced, with darts and ſtones; ſo that they could not proceed, till they had cleared them. To this end the proconſul in perſon at the head of a detachment attacked the firſt houſe, houſe, and made himſelf maſter of it ſword in hand. His example was followed by the officers and ſoldiers, who went on from houſe to houſe, putting all to the ſword they met with. As faſt as the houſes were cleared on both ſides of the ſtreets, the Romans advanced in order of battle towards the citadel, but met with a vigorous reſiſtance from the Carthaginians, who on this occaſion behaved with uncommon reſolution. From the market-place to the citadel two bodies of men fought their way every ſtep, one above on the roofs of the houſes, the other below in the ſtreets. The ſlaughter was inexpreſſibly great and dreadful. The air rung with ſhrieks and lamentations. Some were cut in pieces, others threw themſelves down from the tops of the houſes; ſo that the ſtreets were filled with dead and mangled bodies. But the deſtruction was yet greater, when, by order of the proconſul, fire was ſet to that quarter of the town, which lay next to the citadel. Incredible multitudes, who had eſcaped the ſwords of the enemy, periſhed in the flames and by the fall of the houſes. After the fire, which laſted ſix days, had demoliſhed houſes enough for the proconſul's purpoſe, he ordered the rubbiſh to be removed, and a large area to be made, where all his troops might have room to act. Then he appeared with his whole army before Byrſa, which ſo terrified the Carthaginians, who had fled thither for refuge, that firſt of all twenty-five thouſand women, and ſoon after thirty thouſand men, came out of the gates, in ſuch a condition as moved pity. They threw themſelves proſtrate before the Roman general, aſking no favour, but life. This the proconſul readily granted, not only to them, but to all who were in Byrſa, except the Roman deſerters, whoſe number amounted to nine hundred. The wife of Aſdrubal earneſtly entreated her huſband to ſuffer her to join the ſuppliants, and carry with her to the proconſul her two ſons, who were yet very young. But the barbarous governor denied her requeſt, and rejected the remonſtrances of his wife with menaces. The Roman deſerters, ſeeing themſelves excluded from mercy, reſolved to die ſword in hand, like brave men, rather than to deliver themſelves up to the vengeance of Rome. Aſdrubal, finding them all to a man determined to defend themſelves to the laſt breath, committed to their care his wife and children, and then gave a moſt remarkable inſtance of cowardice and Carthaginian inconſtancy. This very governor who had braved death, when it was at a diſtance, and proteſted, that the ſun ſhould never never ſee him ſurvive Carthage; this fierce Aſdrubal was ſo mean-ſpirited, as to come alone, and privately throw himſelf at the conqueror's feet. The general was well pleaſed to ſee his proud rival humbled, but granted him his life, and kept him to grace his triumph. The Carthaginians in the citadel no ſooner underſtood, that their commander had abandoned the place, than they threw open the gates, and put the proconſul in poſſeſſion of Byrſa. The Romans had now no enemy to contend with but the nine hundred deſerters, who, being reduced to deſpair, retired into the temple of Æſculapius, which was a ſecond citadel within the firſt. There the proconſul attacked them; and thoſe unhappy wretches finding there was no way to eſcape, ſet fire to the temple. As the flames ſpread, they retreated from one part to another, till they got to the roof of the building. There Aſdrubals wife appeared in her beſt apparel, as if the day of her death had been a day of triumph to her; and after having uttered the moſt bitter imprecations againſt her huſband, whom ſhe ſaw ſtanding below with Æmilianus, Baſe coward, ſaid ſhe, the mean things thou haſt done, to ſave thy life, ſhall not avail thee; thou ſhalt die this inſtant, at leaſt, in thy two children. Having thus ſpoke, ſhe drew out a dagger, ſtabbed them both, and, while they were yet ſtruggling for life, threw them from the top of the temple, and leaped down after them into the flames [g].

The proconſul ſets fire to one of the quarters of the city.

Aſdrubal delivers himſelf up to the Roman general.

So many ſcenes of horror drew tears from the eyes of the Roman general, and caſt him into a penſive ſilence, which he broke at length with two verſes out of Homer, wherein the deſtruction of Troy was foretold: The day will come, when proud Troy ſhall fall a prey to the flames, and the ſword ſhall mow down Priam and his people. As the proconſul ſighed in repeating theſe lines, Polybius, who was always near him, took the liberty to aſk him, What he meant by Troy and the people of Priam? Æmilianus, without naming Rome, gave him ſufficiently to underſtand, that he feared his own country would meet with the ſame fate as Troy and Carthage. The greateſt ſtates, ſaid he, have their periods, after which fortune overturns what ſhe took pleaſure in raiſing [h]. The proconſul delivered up the city

Carthage plundered.

[g] Appian. ibid. & in Syriac Plut. in apoph. Val. Max. l. iii. c. 1. Oroſ. l. iv. c. ult. Liv. in epit. [h] Polyb. apud Appian. Eutrop. l. iv.

city to be plundered, but in the manner preſcribed by the Roman military law. The ſoldiers were allowed to appropriate to themſelves all the furniture, utenſils, and braſs-money they ſhould find in private houſes. But all the gold and ſilver, the ſtatues, pictures, &c. were reſerved to be put into the hands of the quæſtors. On this occaſion the cities of Sicily, which had been often plundered by the Carthagi-nian armies, recovered a great number of ſtatues, pictures, and other valuable monuments; among the reſt, the famous brazen bull, which Phalaris had ordered to be caſt, and made uſe of as the inſtrument of his cruelty, was reſtored to the inhabitants of Agrigentum (S). The proconſul put part of the ſpoils on board a galley, which he diſpatched to Rome to acquaint the ſenate, that Carthage was taken, and the war in Africa finiſhed. At the ſame time, he deſired new inſtructions from the conſcript fathers as to the demolition of the walls, temples, and houſes of Carthage, his good-nature and compaſſion inclining him to ſpare what yet remained of that ſtately metropolis. The joy of the people at Rome was inexpreſſibly great on the news of the reduction of Carthage. They anticipated the decree of the ſenate, and, meeting by tribes of their own accord, crouded to the temples to thank the gods for the ſucceſs of their arms. Upon the report which the meſſenger ſent by Æmilianus made to the ſenate, the conſcript fathers, after having ſpent ſome time in deliberations and debates, diſpatched the following inſtructions to their general: 1. The city of Carthage with Byrſa and Megalia ſhall be entirely demoliſhed, and no traces of them left. 2. All the cities, that have lent Carthage any aſſiſtance ſhall be diſmantled. 3. The territories of thoſe

(S) Among the curioſities which Æmilianus gave to his friends and to ſeveral lords of Numidia, Salluſt mentions ſome libraries (30), which the general, who knew the value of ſo rich a treaſure, preſerved from the flames. He beſtowed all the books on the ſons of Micipſa, except twenty-eight volumes, which treated of agriculture, and were ſaid to have been wrote by one Mago a Carthaginian. This work the Roman ſenate thought ſo uſeful, that they ordered ſome able perſons to tranſlate it out of the language of the country into Latin: ſo very ſenſible were the Romans of the advantages of huſbandry, the moſt illuſtrious men among them applying themſelves ſeriouſly to that employment, and looking upon it as the chief reſource of the ſtate.

(30) Salluſt. de bell. Jugurth.

cities, which have declared for the Romans, ſhall be enlarged with lands taken from the enemy. 4. All the lands between Carthage and Hippo ſhall be divided among the inhabitants of Utica. 5. All the Africans of the Carthaginian ſtate, both men and women, ſhall pay an annual tribute to the Roman people at ſo much per head. 6. The whole country, which was ſubject to the Carthaginian ſtate, ſhall be turned into a Roman province, and be governed by a prætor in the ſame manner as Sicily. Laſtly, Rome ſhall ſend commiſſioners into Africa, there to ſettle jointly with the proconſul the ſtate of the new province. This decree was carried by the ten commiſſioners, and ſtrictly executed.

Carthage utterly deſtroyed. Year after the Flood, 2858. Before Chriſt, 141. Of Rome, 607.

But before the proconſul deſtroyed Carthage, he performed all thoſe religious ceremonies which were required on ſuch occaſions. He firſt ſacrificed victims to the gods, and then cauſed a plough to be drawn round the walls of the city. After this the towers, ramparts, walls, and all the works which the Carthaginians had raiſed, in the courſe of many ages and at a vaſt expence, were levelled with the ground. Laſtly, fire was ſet to the edifices of this proud metropolis, which conſumed them all, not a ſingle houſe eſcaping the flames. Though the fire began in all quarters at the ſame time, and burnt with incredible fury, it continued for ſeventeen days together before all the buildings were conſumed; and hence we may judge of the vaſt extent of that metropolis. When the city was entirely demoliſhed, and the affairs of the new province ſettled, the proconſul embarqued his troops, and returned to Rome, where he was honoured with a magnificent triumph, and the glorious ſurname of the Second Africanus. After his triumph he depoſited in the capital an urn full of the aſhes of the capital of Africa, which he thought an agreeable offering to Jupiter Capitolinus. Aſdrubal and Bythias the general of the Carthaginian horſe, after having been led in chains before the triumphant victor's chariot, were, at the requeſt of Æmilianus, allowed to enjoy both life and liberty. Appian is the only author, who tells us, that Aſdrubal killed himſelf, to avoid the ſhame of being carried in triumph. The reſt of the priſoners were ſold to the beſt bidder, or periſhed in the various priſons, to which they were confined [i]. Thus ended one of the moſt renowned cities in the world, world, both for command and riches, after it had ſubſiſted near ſeven hundred years, given law to many diſtant provinces, and for the ſpace of an hundred years rivalled Rome herſelf, and reduced her once to the utmoſt extremity.

[i] Appian. in Punic. Eutrop. l. iv. Flor. l. ii. c. 15. Zonar. l. ix.

CARTHAGE was not the only great and wealthy city which the Romans deſtroyed in this remarkable year. Corinth had the ſame fate, after it had flouriſhed at leaſt nine hundred years. But, as we have given, in our hiſtory of the Achæans, a very particular account of this memorable event, we ſhall not treſpaſs upon our readers patience by repeating the ſame tranſactions, but follow the victorious arms of the republic in the conqueſts they made, after the reduction of Greece and Africa, which were both now become Roman provinces. Corinth deſtroyed.

CHAP. VIII.

The hiſtory of Rome, from the deſtruction of Carthage to the end of the ſedition of the Gracchi.

AFTER the deſtruction of Carthage and Corinth, Rome had no enemy to contend with, either in Greece or Africa, the imperious republic having put it out of the power of the conquered people to raiſe new diſturbances. However, ſhe was not yet in a condition to lay down her arms, and ſuffer her citizens, after ſo many labours, to enjoy at home the ſweets of peace. She had ſtill a troubleſome war to maintain in Spain, where the brave Viriathus had gained great advantages over all the generals, who had been ſent againſt him, during the late Punic war. After the defeat and death of Viriathus, of whom we have ſpoken above, the Luſitanian had augmented his forces, and defeated in three pitched battles the prætors Caius Plautius Hypſæus and Claudius Unimanus, though they led againſt him very numerous armies. As he had been victorious for ſix years together, putting the Romans to flight where-ever he met them, he had drawn off whole nations from Rome, and laid waſte the countries of her moſt faithful allies. The ſe- Viriathus gains great advantages over the Romans in Spain.

nate therefore thought it neceſſary to ſend a conſul of reputation, with a conſular army, into Further Spain, and choſe for that expedition Q. Fabius Æmilianus, who had been juſt raiſed to the conſulate with L. Hoſtilius Mancinus. The latter had commanded the Roman fleet in Africa, two years before, in quality of prætor; the former was brother to the ſecond Africanus, and ſon to Paulus Æmilius, but adopted into the Fabian family, whence he had the name of Fabius and the ſurname of Æmilianus. While he continued at Rome to raiſe two new legions, C. Lælius, the friend of the Second Africanus, to whom Hither Spain had fallen by lot, embarqued without delay, and, paſſing from his own province into Further Spain, convinced the Luſitanian general that he was not invincible; and this is all we learn from hiſtory of this expedition. Some months after Fabius arrived, but ſpent the whole ſummer in inuring his new troops to the toils of war and diſcipline. The next year, when Ser. Sulpicius Galba and L. Aurel. Cotta were conſuls, Fabius who was continued in the command of the army in Spain, gained two victories over Viriathus, and made himſelf maſter of two important places, which had been long in the hands of the rebels. However, on his return to Rome the ſenate did not judge his victories worthy of a triumph, which at this time was granted to ſuch generals only, as had killed at the leaſt five thouſand of the enemy in one battle[k].

But is defeated by Q. Fabius.

THE next year, Q. Cæcilius Metellus and Appius Claudius Pulcher were raiſed to the conſulate, and the former with the prætor Q. Pompeius appointed to carry on the war againſt Viriathus. Pompeius reached Spain before Metellus, and attacked Viriathus with ſome ſucceſs. But he was afterwards worſted by the Luſitanian, driven out of the field, and obliged to ſhut himſelf up in Corduba. Soon after Metellus arrived, and offered the enemy battle, which Viriathus declined; and then the conſul, entering the country of the Arevacæ, who had lately revolted, obliged the whole nation to ſubmit upon his own terms. Metellus was an officer of great experience and perſonal bravery, very ſevere in keeping the ſoldiers to their duty, and the author of the famous ſaying, ſince put into the mouths of many generals, If he thought that his coat could be privy to his deſigns, he would burn it[l]. While Metellus was ſignalizing himſelf in Spain, his collegue, who commanded an Metellus gains the aſcendant over Viriathus.

[k] Appian. in Iberic. [l] Author. de vir. illuſtr. Plut. in apoph.

an army in Ciſalpine Gaul, forced the Salaſſi into a rebellion. This nation inhabited a province near the head of the Po, and had frequent diſputes with their neighbours the Inſubres about the Druria, which watered their country before it reached the borders of Inſubria. This river then brought down gold mixed with its ſand, and the Salaſſi uſed ſeveral arts to gather the particles of this precious metal, before they were carried by the ſtream into the country of the Inſubres. Of this the Inſubres complained to the conſul, who hereupon immediately entered the country of the Salaſſi in an hoſtile manner, and obliged them, contrary to their inclinations, to have recourſe to arms in their own defence. The conſul was defeated in a pitched battle, and loſt five thouſand of his men. Upon the news of this defeat the Sibylline books being conſulted, the decemvirs declared, that all the forms of religion had not been obſerved in this haſty war with the Salaſſi. Hereupon the general was ordered to offer a ſacrifice on the borders of the enemy's country. He obeyed, and then, the prejudices of religion giving the ſuperſtitious ſoldiery new courage, he fought a ſecond battle, defeated the Salaſſi, and killed five thouſand of them in his turn. As ſoon as the campaign was ended, the conſul returned to Rome, and demanded a triumph for having killed five thouſand of the enemy in a pitched battle, which was the preſent rule: But as he had loſt five thouſand legionaries in a former battle, his petition was rejected. Hereupon the conſul decreed himſelf that honour, and was the firſt who entered Rome triumphantly in ſpite of the ſenate and people. As he was advancing towards the capitol, a tribune of the people attempted to bring the victor down from his chariot. But his daughter Claudia, a veſtal, whom he carried in the chariot with him, oppoſed the tribune, who after ſome altercations gave way, and in the perſon of Claudia ſhewed his regard both for her ſex and profeſſion. The conduct of the veſtal was highly applauded by the people, but the conſul was loaded with curſes [m].

The Salaſſi defeat the Romans, but are in a ſecond battle defeated by them.

THE following year, when Q. Fabius Servilianus and L. Cæcilius Metellus were conſuls, Q. Cæcilius Metellus, who was continued in Spain in quality of proconſul, purſued the war there, and diſplayed his ſtrict regard to diſcipline among his own troops, and his humanity to the conquered, in ſo glorious a manner, that it is not eaſy to decide which did him moſt honour. As he could not bring Viriathus to a battle, he applied himſelf to the recovering of thoſe places, which had ſided with the Luſitanian. He firſt laid ſiege to Contrebia, and having made a breach in the wall, appointed five manipuli to mount it. Theſe were repulſed; but the general ordered them to renew the attack, without being reinforced; and then the ſhame of their former cowardice inſpired them with ſuch reſolution, that they fought like lions, and, in ſpite of all oppoſition, carried the place. He then inveſted Nertobrigia, where he gave a remarkable inſtance of his humanity and good nature. A chief lord of the country, named Rhetogenes, came out of the place, and ſurrendered himſelf to the Romans. But, as he had left in the city his wife and children, the inhabitants, inraged at his deſertion, placed them in the breach, which the legionaries were to mount. Hereupon the good-natured general, finding he could not attack the city without ſpilling their blood, abandoned a certain conqueſt, and raiſed the ſiege. The fame of an act of ſuch humanity being ſoon ſpread through all Tarragonian Spain, the inhabitants of the revolted cities ſtrove who ſhould firſt ſubmit to him. Metellus received them, and among the reſt the Nertobrigians, into an alliance with Rome; and at length recovered the whole country except Termatia and Numantia [n], of which cities we ſhall ſpeak hereafter.

[m] Liv. epit. l. liii. Strab. l. iv. Dio. Caſſ. l. liii.

Metellus recovers all Tarragonian Spain.

On the other hand, the conſul Servilianus, who was engaged with Viriathus in Further Spain, gained at firſt ſome advantages over that brave commander; but in the end was defeated by him with the loſs of three thouſand legionaries. The Luſitanian would have taken the Roman camp, if he had not been prevented by a young Roman, named Caius Fannius, ſon-in-law to Caius Lælius, who, putting himſelf at the head of the legionaries, ſuſtained the attack of the enemy, till night coming on put an end to the conflict [o].

The conſul Servilianus defeated by Viriathus.

When the time came for the great elections, Q. Pompeius, a man of a mean, if not of an infamous, birth, was raiſed to the conſulate in preference to Caius Lælius, though ſupported by the intereſt of his inſeparable friend Scipio Æmilianus. The collegue given him was Cn. Servilius Cæpio, a patrician. In the ſame comitia Servilianus was appointed pointed to continue the war in Spain as proconſul; whereas Metellus was only allowed to command in Hither Spain till the arrival of his ſucceſſor, though he earneſtly ſolicited the favour, formerly granted to others, of finiſhing the war, which he had ſo happily begun. When he underſtood, that Pompey, a man of no birth or merit, and beſides, his perſonal enemy was to ſucceed him, he reſolved to make the beſt uſe of his time, and ſignalize himſelf by ſome great action, before the arrival of his worthleſs ſucceſſor. With this view he marched out of his quarters in the depth of the winter, entered the further province, and taking his rout towards Luſitania, where Viriathus had cantoned his troops, endeavoured, before he left Spain, to draw that famous commander to a battle. But Viriathus, though proud and enterpriſing againſt others, kept himſelf wholly upon the defenſive againſt Metellus, who thereupon over-ran great part of the country, and brought back Eſcadia, Gemella, Obolcula (T), and many other conſiderable cities to their duty. Some of the heads of the revolt were puniſhed with death, and the reſt, to the number of nine thouſand five hundred, ſold to the beſt bidder. Thus Metellus ſhewed what he could do, and would have done, had he been continued in his province; which was the chief point he had in view. But, in the height of his ſucceſs, news was brought him, that his ſucceſſor had left Rome; and then his reſentment revived; he vented his paſſion, firſt, in raſh expreſſions, and then in actions, which were much more blameable. In the height of his paſſion, he reſolved to weaken the army he was to deliver up. With this view he diſbanded the flower of his troops, exhauſted the magazines, let his elephants die, broke in pieces the arrows which were provided for the Cretan archers, and threw them into the river. Thus Metellus, famous for the conqueſt of Macedon, whence he had the glorious ſurname of Macedonicus, and one of the beſt commanders

[n] Liv. ibid Front. Strat l. iv. c. 1. Flor l. 1. Vell. Patercul. l ii. [o] Liv. in epit l. xxxv. Eutrop. l. iv. Appian. in Iberic.

Metellus recalled.

His ſucceſs in Spain.

His reſentments.

Rome

(T) All we know of Eſcadia is, that it ſtood in the neighbourhood of Bætica and Luſitania. Gemella, called by Pliny Tucci and Gemella Auguſta, ſtood, according to Ambroſius Morales, in the place where Martos, a ſmall city of Andaluſia, now ſtands. Obolcula, which Antoninus and Ptolemy call Obulcula, was a city of Turdetania, a province of Bœtica. Rodericus Carus is of opinion, that it ſtood on the ſpot, where Caſtillo de la Menclova was afterwards built, that is, forty-two miles eaſt of Seville. This ſituation agrees with Antoninus's itinerary.

Rome had, ſacrificed the good of his country to his own private ambition. On his return he was refuſed a triumph; the ſlighteſt puniſhment the republic could inflict upon him °. But after all the army, which Metellus ſurrendered up to Pompey, conſiſted of thirty thouſand foot and two thouſand horſe, a ſufficient force to have ſubdued all Celtiberia, if the new general had had the conduct and experience of his predeceſſor. He no ſooner appeared in the field, than the Termantians and Numantines, who had kept themſelves in a ſtate of independency, offered him very advantageous terms of peace. But the preſumptuous conſul imprudently and obſtinately inſiſted upon their delivering up their arms, and thereby kindled a war, which coſt the Romans a great deal of blood. The conſul, full of confidence, drew near Numantia and inveſted it; but the Numantines, having firſt ſurrounded and cut in pieces a party of Romans, fell afterwards upon the main body of the army; and ſo galled them from the neighbouring eminences with ſhowers of darts and arrows, that the conſul thought it adviſeable to retire. Accordingly, he removed to Termantia; but was not attended with better ſucceſs before this city, than before the other. The very firſt day, the Termantians killed ſeven hundred of his legionaries, took a great convoy, which was coming to the Roman camp, after having put to flight the tribune who eſcorted it, and not only defeated a conſiderable body of Roman horſe, but forced them to retire from poſt to poſt, till they came to the edge of a precipice, where they puſhed both men and horſes down over one another; ſo that they were all daſhed to pieces among the rocks. The Termantians continued in the field all night, in order to engage the reſt of the Roman cavalry next day; which they did accordingly; but, the enemy being far ſuperior to them in numbers, they were forced to quit the field, after having kept their ground from break of day to ſun-ſet. The number of the ſlain was equal on both ſides; but the loſs, which was a very conſiderable one to a ſmall nation, was ſcarce felt by the Romans. However, the conſul did not think fit to beſiege the city; but marched to Malia, a ſmall town, whoſe inhabitants ſurrendered to the Romans, after having maſſacred the Numantine garriſon. From thence the conſul advanced to Lanci, or, as others call it, Lagni, which covered the country of the Numantines. The Numantine

The occaſion of the Numantine war.

The Numantines and Termantians gain conſiderable advantages over the Romans.

° Appian. ibid. Val. Max. l. ix. c. 3.

mantine garriſon, finding that the inhabitants had privately agreed with the conſul to ſacrifice them, entered their houſes in the night, and made a dreadful ſlaughter of them. The conſul, taking advantage of this inteſtine war, gave orders for the aſſault, and made himſelf, without oppoſition, maſter of the defenceleſs city. Pompey, ſeeing himſelf in poſſeſſion of the place, thought it neceſſary to ſignalize his clemency and ſeverity: but unluckily he miſapplied them both; for he put the Lancians to the ſword, and gave quarter to the Numantian garriſon. Such were the exploits of Pompey after having kindled the Numantian war, and exaſperated a brave people, whom he might have reduced upon terms very advantageous for his republic [p].

In Further Spain, the proconſul Servilianus opened the campaign with ſucceſs, having obliged Viriathus to raiſe the ſiege of Baccia, and taken ſome caſtles in that neighbourhood. This encouraged the conſul to lay ſiege to Eriſana, a ſtrong city in Luſitania. But Viriathus, having by long marches reached the place, and got into it with a ſtrong detachment in the night, before the lines of circumvallation were finiſhed, made a vigorous ſally upon the Romans, and drove them to a place where the reſt of his army lay in ambuſh. There they were ſurrounded on all ſides, and ſo hemmed in, that the only choice they had left was death or ſlavery. The brave Luſitanian, having now the proconſul and the whole Roman army in his power, inſtead of putting them all to the ſword, as he might have eaſily done, ſent a deputation to Serviliamus, offering to conclude a peace with him on this ſingle condition; That he ſhould continue maſter of the country now in his power, and that the Romans ſhould remain poſſeſſed of the reſt of Spain. The proconſul, who expected nothing leſs than death or ſlavery, thought theſe very favourable and moderate terms; and therefore, without heſitation, concluded a peace, ſigned it, and got it ſoon after ratified by the Roman ſenate and people. Thus Viriathus at length put in execution the glorious deſign he had always had in view, which was to erect himſelf a kingdom, in the vaſt country he conquered from the republic [q]. And indeed, had it not been for the treachery of the Romans, he would have become, as an antient author calls calls him, the Romulus of Spain [r]. He would have founded a monarchy capable of counterbalancing the power of Rome, or at leaſt of ſetting bounds to her conqueſts in thoſe parts.

The proconſul Servilianus forced to make peace with Viriathus.

[p] Appian. ibid. Diodor. Sicul. in eclog. Oroſ. l. v. c. 4. Front. ſtrat. l. iv. Val. Max. l. ii. c. 2. [q] Appian. Liv. Diodor. Sicul. ibid.

THE next year, C. Lælius was promoted to the conſulate with Q. Servilius Cæpio. The latter was a man of no probity or honour; but however, it fell to his lot to command in Further Spain, while Lælius, a general of experienced wiſdom, equity, and valour, continued inactive in Rome. Pompey was continued general in Hither Spain; but the republic ſent a certain number of ſenators to regulate his conduct and temper his fire. Before they arrived, he undertook the mad project of reducing Numantia, by turning the ſtream of the Durius, which ſupplied it with water. This gave the inhabitants an opportunity of harraſſing his troops, and cutting off ſuch numbers of them, that he was at length obliged to abandon the enterprize, and retire from before the place. And now, the great army, he had received from Metellus, being reduced to a very ſmall number of troops, he began to reflect ſeriouſly on his miſconduct; and, in order to ſcreen himſelf from cenſures, very artfully brought about a peace with the Numantians, on worſe terms than they had before offered him; for they only agreed to deliver up the Roman deſerters, and pay the republic thirty talents at different times. However, this peace was approved of, and ſigned both by Pompey and the ſenators, who had been ſent from Rome to be of his council. In the mean time, Q. Servilius Cæpio, to whoſe lot Further Spain had fallen, being deſirous to revenge the diſgrace the Romans had ſuffered the laſt year before Eriſana, preſſed the ſenate to order him to break the peace with Viriathus. The letters he wrote, after his arrival in Spain, and his continual remonſtrances, made ſuch impreſſions on the ſenate, that they baſely directed him to exaſperate the Luſitanian by mean artifices, and force him by repeated affronts to commit the firſt acts of hoſtility. Purſuant to this order, which was ſo unworthy of a great and powerful people, the conſul did all he could to pick a quarrel with Viriathus; but he overlooked the affronts offered him, proteſting, that he would inviolably obſerve the conditions of the peace, granted him by the Roman ſenate and people. The conſul, finding he could not by any means ſtir up the Luſitanian to an open breach, made freſh

A peace with the Numantines.

The baſeneſs and injuſtice of the Romans.

applications

[r] Flor. l. ii. c. 17.

applications to the ſenate; and the conſcript fathers, to the eternal ſhame of their republic, ordered him to declare war; and proclaimed Viriathus, who had not given them the leaſt provocation, an enemy to Rome. The conſul was no ſooner impowered to begin the war, than he put his troops in motion, and having made himſelf maſter of Arſa, a city of Bœtica, he purſued Viriathus into the country of the Carpetani, and there reduced him to great ſtreights. But the Luſitanian made a moſt glorious retreat, and, though the conſul believed him ſhut in among the hills and rocks on all ſides, he diſappeared with his troops ſo ſuddenly, that the Romans, when they returned to their camp, turned the affair into ridicule, and were very ſevere in their jeſts on their general. Cæpio ſeeing himſelf thus deluded by the enemy, entered the country of the Vettones, and committed there moſt dreadful devaſtations. He then marched in queſt of Viriathus, whom he reduced ſo low, having an army far ſuperior in number to his, that the Luſitanian was forced to ſue again for peace, and even to comply with the hard preliminary impoſed upon him, which was to ſacrifice all thoſe who had cauſed any cities to revolt from the Romans, among whom was his wife's father. He put ſome of them to death in his own camp, and the reſt he delivered up to the ſeverity of the conſul, who cut off their right hands. He hoped, that this blind obedience would ſoften the conſul. But, to his great ſurprize, the next order he received was, to diſarm his troops; this the whole army rejected with great indignation, and hoſtilities were renewed, during which Viriathus continued his negotiations with the conſul, being wholly bent on founding a new kingdom in Spain, and ſettling himſelf on the throne. The perſons he employed to treat with Cæpio were Audax, Ditalco, and Minur, in whom he repoſed an entire confidence. But the conſul finding them, after ſome private conferences, to be men wholly devoted to their own intereſt, and capable of any crime, by which they could promote it, engaged them by rich preſents and great promiſes baſely and treacherouſly to murder their general and their friend in his ſleep. Thus the Romans now began to have no regard to the law of nations, to public faith, or to humanity itſelf. The aſſaſſins, after they had committed the execrable murder, fled to the conſul's camp, informed him, that they had diſpatched his rival, and demanded the promiſed reward. But they found by experience, that traitors are hated even by thoſe who profit by their treachery. For the conſul told them, that all he would do for them was, to give them protection, adding with a reproachful air, that the Roman magiſtrates were not very ready to reward thoſe who murdered their own generals. The Luſitanian troops were inconſolable for the loſs of their commander, who was, without all doubt, the greateſt man Spain ever bred, and deemed invincible by Rome herſelf. After his death the Luſitanians appointed one Tantalus to command them, who, having raſhly undertaken the ſiege of Saguntum, was ſurprized by Cæpio, defeated, and forced to ſurrender himſelf and his whole army at diſcretion. And thus an end was put to this troubleſome war, after it had laſted fourteen years. However, the ſenate had ſtill ſo much honour left, as to refuſe a triumph to the infamous conſul, though they enjoyed the fruits of his villainy, and even continued him in the command of the army another year in Further Spain, with the title of proconſul [s].

The infamous conduct of Cæpio.

The war in Further Spain ended.

The next year, when Lucius Calpurnius Piſo and M. Popilius Lænas were conſuls, the republic baſely and unjuſtly broke the treaty, which Pompey had concluded with the Numantines, though the proconſul had received from thoſe unfortunate people the deſerters, hoſtages, and money ſtipulated. The following year, P. Scipio Naſica and D. Junius Brutus were advanced to the conſulate, and the latter appointed to govern Further Spain, where he executed the orders he brought from Rome, of ſettling ſome of the veterans in a colony with Viriathus's ſoldiers. This new colony he called Valentia, which in proceſs of time became a place of great renown. After this he attacked the banditti, who ravaged his province, in their own country, which not only the men, but likewiſe the women, defended with unparalleled bravery. However, the conſul at length reduced, and, in regard of their courage, pardoned them. In the mean time, Popilius, now proconſul, purſuant to the orders he received from the ſenate, broke the treaty of peace with Numantia, and marched againſt that city. But he no ſooner appeared before it, than the Numantines, ſallying out, put the whole Roman army to flight, and made ſuch ſlaughter of them, that they were not in a condition to make any further attempts, during the whole campaign. In the following conſulate of M. Æmilius Lepidus and C. Hoſtilius Mancinus, Brutus paſſed ſed the Minius in Further Spain, and entered the country of the Bracarini, where the women, intermixed with all their troops, fought with aſtoniſhing bravery. They engaged the legionaries without betraying the leaſt fear, killed many of them, and were themſelves cut in pieces without a ſhriek. Nevertheleſs Talabriſia and other cities ſurrendered; and the conſul, rather by his clemency, than by his ſword, gained over the whole country to the intereſt of Rome [t].

The Romans defeated before Numantia.

[s] Appian. in Iberic. Diodor. Sicul. apud Valeſ. Auth. de vir. illuſtr.

DURING theſe expeditions of Brutus in Further Spain, the conſul Mancinus took upon him the command of the army, which was delivered up to him by Popilius in Hither Spain, and drew near to Numantia. But, as thoſe brave legionaries, who were the terror of the whole world, trembled at the very ſight, nay, at the bare name of a Numantine, the conſul thought it adviſeable to decamp, and move farther off in the night. But the Numantines, being informed of their motions, purſued them, and having firſt ſeized the camp, which they had abandoned, came up with the flying legions, and made a dreadful havock of them. The conſular army conſiſted of at leaſt thirty thouſand, whereas the Numantines were not above four thouſand. Nevertheleſs this ſmall body, as ſtrange as it may appear, killed in the purſuit twenty thouſand of the Romans, and put the reſt to a diſorderly flight. At the return of light the conſul ſaw himſelf ſurrounded by heaps of dead bodies, and ſhut in on all ſides by the enemy in a rough and mountainous country. But in this ſad ſituation, inſtead of giving himſelf up to deſpair, he acted as prudence and the preſent neceſſity ſeemed to require. As there was no way left for him and the poor remains of his army to eſcape, the prudent conſul began a negotiation with the enemy, offering to conclude a peace with them upon reaſonable terms. This was what the Numantines had long deſired; but nevertheleſs, the bad ſucceſs of their agreement with the conſul Pompeius deterred them from entering into a treaty with a Roman general. They therefore deſired to treat only with Tiberius Sempronius Gracchus, who was then quæſtor in the conſular army, and greatly eſteemed for his probity even by the enemy. With him the conferences were begun, and a peace concluded upon theſe terms: 1. That the Numantines ſhould ſuffer the Romans to retire unmoleſted: 2. That the inhabitants of Numantia ſhould maintain maintain their independence, and be reckoned among the friends of the Roman people. The conſul, the quæſtor, and all the chief officers of the Roman army, bound themſelves by a ſolemn oath inviolably to obſerve the ſecond article. By this means the lives of ten thouſand citizens were ſaved to the republic; ſo that the quæſtor hoped to make a merit of his negotiation with the Roman people. The Numantines, ſoon after the treaty was concluded, gave an inſtance of the ſincerity of their intentions. When they plundered the Roman camp, they had taken among other things the quæſtor's books of accounts; and Gracchus went into the city to demand them. The Numantines received him with great civility and politeneſs, reſtored him his books, and even offered him all the booty they had taken in the camp. But the quæſtor, charmed with the generoſity and good-nature of the Numantines, rejected the offer and accepted only of a ſmall box, which belonged to him, and was full of the incenſe which he uſed to burn in honour of his domeſtic gods [u].

The Numantines entirely defeat the Roman army.

They conclude a peace with the Romans.

[t] Liv. in epit. Front. ſtrat. l. iii. c. 17. Appian. ibid.

When news of the peace concluded with the Numantines was brought to Rome, the ſhocking injuſtice and baſeneſs of the Romans towards ſo generous an enemy appeared anew. The Numantinés had ſaved the lives of ten thouſand Romans, who were in their power, when the peace was concluded; but though the ſenate and people were glad to reap this advantage from the treaty, yet they reſolved to break it; and therefore would not admit the Numantine embaſſadors, on their firſt arrival, within the walls of the city. 'Tis true, that when the new conſuls, P. Furius Philus and Sex. Attilius Serranus, were choſen, they granted them an audience, when one of the embaſſadors made a ſpeech in the ſenate, which would have affected them, if they had had any ſenſe of juſtice or humanity. But as theſe virtues had now forſaken Rome, the ſenate and people baſely and unjuſtly reſolved to break the peace, and extirpate that generous and innocent people, notwithſtanding the remonſtrances of the conſul, the quæſtor, and all the officers of the army who had ſerved in Spain. They pretended to make the injured Numantines ſatisfaction, by ordering the conſul Mancinus to be carried, bound hand and foot, to one of the gates of Numantia, and be there delivered delivered up to the enemy, ſtripped of his arms and cloaths [w].

The baſeneſs and injuſtice of the Romans.

[u] Liv. in epit. Plut. in Gracch. Apppian. in Iberic.

DURING theſe tranſactions at Rome, M. Æmilius Lepidus, who had been ſent to ſucceed Mancinus in Hither Spain, began an unjuſt war with the Vaccæi, purely for the ſake of finding himſelf work. But, while he was preparing to beſiege Palantia, their capital, deputies came from Rome, with a decree of the ſenate ordering him to deſiſt. However, Æmilius perſiſted in his deſign, till the Vaccæi, by intercepting his convoy, obliged him to decamp for want of proviſions. The Romans left their camp in the night, and the Vaccæi, knowing in what confuſion they retired, purſued them, and in the purſuit put ſix thouſand legionaries to the ſword. Nevertheleſs, Æmilius, on his return to Rome, was treated with more lenity than he expected, being condemned only to pay a fine. And now the conſul, P. Furius Philus, being arrived in Spain with orders to renew the war with the Numantines, thought it neceſſary in the firſt place to deliver up to them the victim he had brought from Rome. It was an affecting ſight to ſee a conſular man, who had lately appeared guarded by lictors, at the head of a flouriſhing army, now deprived of all the marks of a Roman citizen, ſtripped naked to the waiſt, and formally committed to the care of a fecialis, who was to put him into the hands of the enemy, for having, as was pretended, impoſed upon them by a falſe peace and an unlawful oath. But the Numantines, not thinking the blood of one man a ſufficient atonement for the breach of the moſt ſolemn engagements, ſhut their gates, declaring that they would not accept of Mancinus, unleſs they had the whole army with him. So that, after he had lain a whole day at the gate of the city, the conſul Furius, agreeable to the equity of the Romans of that time, thinking this a ſufficient ſatisfaction to the injured people, brought him back to his camp, entertained him with reſpect, and reſtored him to all the rights of a Roman citizen; nay, he was afterwards admitted to his place in the ſenate. The war with the Numantines, though already declared, was not renewed while Furius continued in Spain, his commiſſion being, it ſeems, confined to the delivering up of Mancinus. But the next year, Q. Calpurnius Piſo, who was

The Romans defeated by the Vaccæi.

Mancinus delivered up to the Numantines, who refuſe to accept of him.

[w] Plut. in Gracch. Appian. in Iberic. Vell. Patercul. l. ii. Oroſ. l. v. c. 5. Cic. de off. l. iii.

was chosen consul with Ser. Fulvius Flaccus, was ordered to carry on the war with vigor against the Numantines. But he, not caring to engage so brave and resolute an enemy, contented himself with besieging Palantia in the country of the Vaccæi, and did not so much as appear before Numantia. But Brutus made great conquests in Lusitania, and penetrated into the country of the Callaici or Gallæci, where he engaged an army of sixty thousand Spaniards, killed fifty thousand of them on the spot, made six thousand prisoners, and almost extirpated the whole nation. Hence he acquired the surname of Callaicus, and was continued in his government, till the war should be ended. This year the Vardæi, a people of Illyricum, rebelled, and rejected all amicable measures. Whereupon the consul Flaccus was sent with an army to reduce them; which he did so effectually, that Rome at his return honoured him with a triumph [w].

Brutus makes great conquests in Lusitania.

In the mean while, the time for the elections being come, Scipio Africanus offered his nephew Fabius Buteo as a candidate for the quæstorship, when, to his great surprise, the tribes demanded to have Scipio himself for their consul, saying, that he only could destroy Numantia, who had destroyed Carthage. A law had been made some years before, enacting, that the same person should not be twice promoted to the consular dignity. The tribunes of the people therefore, in order to honour Scipio with the fasces a second time with the approbation of the senate, proposed to the comitia, that Scipio should have a special privilege granted him for his promotion, and that, his privilege should not be made a precedent. The people accepted the proposal with joy, and nominated him consul for the next year with C. Fulvius Flaccus. Scipio was ordered without drawing lots, to carry on the war against the Numantines, but was not allowed to raise any new levies, the senate telling him, that there were soldiers enough in Spain, and that they only wanted a good general. However he drew together a body of about five hundred voluntiers, all horsemen, whom he called The squadron of his friends, and borrowed about four thousand men of the cities of Italy. In the number of the former was, according to Velleius Paterculus, the famous poet Lucilius. He also wrote to Micipsa, king of Numidia, to send him succours, and then made all haste to his province, where he wisely spent the first firſt ſummer in reforming his troops, till he had altered them to his wiſh; and frugality, vigilance, and a love of duty had taken place of effeminacy, lazineſs, and indolence, which had long prevailed among the officers as well as the ſoldiers. Neither did he ſpare, but rather encreaſe, their labours during the winter. He obliged every man, that went out of the camp, to carry his tools, and bring back ſome ſtakes with him. When the ſoldiers complained of this hardſhip, he told them, that he would oblige them to bring paliſades to fortify the camp, till they had learnt to fortify it with their ſwords [x]. At this time he received a reinforcement of cavalry, elephants, and ſlingers from Numidia. They were a choice body, but what moſt diſtinguiſhed them was, the young prince, who commanded them, by name Jugurtha, a prince with whom the Romans will be but too well acquainted hereafter. Young Marius made on this occaſion his firſt campaign, and the brave prince entered into ſo ſtrict a friendſhip with him, that he was inſeparable from him, little ſuſpecting, that Marius would one day become his moſt cruel enemy and his conqueror.

Scipio Africanus sent against the Numantines.

[w] Flor. l. ii. c. 18. Oros. l. v. c. 5. Liv. epit. l. lvi.

AND now Scipio's conſulſhip expired; but he was continued in the command of the Roman army in Spain, till ſuch time as Numantia ſhould be reduced. The new conſuls choſen were P. Mucius Scævola (U) and L. Calpurnius Piſo Frugi. Sicily fell by lot to the latter, where he was to make war with the revolted ſlaves; and Italy to the former, who continued in the capitol to calm, if poſſible, the ſpirit of ſedition, which began to appear there. Scipio, as ſoon as the ſeaſon would permit, ſent out large detachments to ravage the country round Numantia; for his ſcheme was to reduce the place, not by force, which would have coſt Rome much blood, but by famine. After he had found, that his troops were no longer afraid of the enemy, but boldly faced them, and even put them to flight, he began to put ſome confidence in his legionaries, and reſolved to begin the ſiege, or rather the blockade, without delay.

[x] Flor. l. ii. c. 18. Appian. ibid. Plut. in apoph.

(U) This is the ſame P. Mucius Scævola, whom Cicero extolls in ſeveral places of his works, as one of the moſt able civilians and moſt virtuous citizens of Rome. Several of the ſame name have been famous for their virtue and probity, which ſeem to have been hereditary in the Mucian family.

Numantia beſieged.

NUMANTIA ſtood on a hill of a difficult acceſs, and had large fields within its walls, which were about three miles in compaſs. The inhabitants, able to bear arms, are ſaid to have been only four thouſand men, at leaſt when the place was firſt inveſted by Scipio, whoſe army conſiſted of threeſcore thouſand well diſciplined troops, Romans and Spaniards. Theſe the proconſul divided into two bodies, the one commanded by himſelf, the other by his brother Q. Fabius, and drawing near to the city, began his works. The Numantines, alarmed at the ſight of ſo formidable an army, made again propoſals of peace; but the proconſul inſiſting upon their delivering up, by way of preliminary, their city, their perſons, and their arms, to be diſpoſed of at pleaſure, they reſolved to prefer a glorious death to an ignominous ſlavery. After they had taken this reſolution, they marched out of the city in good order, inſulted the Romans in their trenches, and with a boldneſs, which deſpair alone could inſpire, offered the Roman general battle. But he declined it, ſaying to his ſoldiers, who began to complain of his conduct, that an able general ought never to hazard a battle, unleſs neceſſity compels him, or ſuch an opportunity offers as makes the victory certain. The Numantines, ſaid he, are actuated by deſpair; their ruin is inevitable; to engage them would be only giving them the pleaſure of ſhedding your blood. Scipio, having thus reſtrained the impetuoſity of his troops, ſurrounded the place with a wide and deep ditch, ſix miles in compaſs. Without this he drew another; and behind that raiſed a rampart, which he ſecured with paliſades, and ſupported with a wall eight foot broad, and ten foot high, with towers at proper diſtances. Then to prevent any communication with the city by water, he ſtopped the navigation of the Durius, which waſhed the walls of the city, with a kind of ſtaccado, which was flanked with two wooden caſtles on the two banks. When the works were finiſhed, he guarded them carefully night and day. The ramparts were lined with legionaries, the towers filled with archers and ſlingers, and men poſted all the way from the circumvallation to his camp, with orders to give notice by ſhouts on which ſide the alarm was given. When any of the works were attacked by the beſieged, the commander on the poſt attacked hung out a red ſtandard by day, and made a great fire by night; upon which notice the general, who kept always twenty thouſand men in a readineſs to march, ſent them immediately ſtrong reinforcements to drive drive back the enemy. Scipio gave no reſt to the beſieged, nor relaxation to his own troops. He viſited each poſt every day, and took a view of all the parts of this vaſt circumvallation. But notwithſtanding all the precaution he could uſe, ſix of the beſieged made their way through his camp, and, eluding the vigilance of the centries, got ſafe to the neighbouring cities, which they endeavoured to ſtir up againſt the Romans. But Lutia was the only place, which did more than pity the unfortunate Numantines. The youth of this city, touched with concern for their diſtreſſed countrymen, reſolved to march to their relief. But the old men in the place, having more at heart their own ſafety, than that of the Numantines, acquainted Scipio, with the reſolution and deſigns of their youth. Hereupon the general without delay, flew to Lutia in perſon with ſome light-armed troops, marched three hundred furlongs in eight hours, and arriving, when leaſt expected, at Lutia, demanded the raſh young men to be delivered up to him. The inhabitants, unwilling to comply with his requeſt and part with their children, concealed them, and pretended they had made their eſcape. But Scipio threatening to pillage the city, they thought it adviſeable to obey, and delivered up to him four hundred of the young men who had been the chief promoters of the late reſolution. The proconſul no ſooner had them in his power, than he cauſed their right hands to be cut off, and returned to his camp by ſun-riſing [y].

Numantia reduced to great ſtreights.

AND now, famine and deſpair encreaſing together in the beſieged city, five embaſſadors came out to Scipio, entreating him in the name of their countrymen, either to let them end their days, like brave men, in a general action, or ſave their liberty by an honourable capitulation. Abarus, who was at the head of the embaſſy, ſuggeſted to Scipio, that it was for his honour, either to ſhew clemency to the people, who had ſo bravely ſignalized their love for liberty, or at leaſt not to deſtroy them otherwiſe than with the ſword. But they received this ſhort anſwer; I will hearken to no propoſals, till you have abſolutely ſurrendered up to me your city, your perſons, and your arms, without any reſerve. Then the fury of the beſiiged firſt vented itſelf on the deputies, whom they cut in pieces for bringing them nothing but ill news. Afterwards, being preſſed by want, they reſolved to make a laſt effort in order to break through the barriers, which confined them; accordingly, they marched out in good order by two gates, and fell upon the works with a fury not to be expreſſed. Their fixed reſolution to die or eſcape made them inſenſible of the many wounds they received. In ſpite of the continual ſhowers of ſtones, darts, and arrows, which were diſcharged upon them from the ramparts and towers, they would have forced their way through the enemy's camp, had not Scipio himſelf, at the head of twenty thouſand men, haſtened to the relief of the troops that defended the poſts attacked by the enemy. They were then, after a ſharp diſpute, forced to give way to numbers and retire, which they did in good order. But their returning into the city was only changing one kind of death for another. For they were now reduced to ſuch ſtreights as to feed firſt on the fleſh of their horſes, afterwards on that of their dead companions, and laſtly, to kill and devour one another. Thus did theſe poor citizens, who were formerly ſo firmly united in carrying on their common intereſt, make war on themſelves in a much more cruel manner, than any common enemy could have done. In this deplorable condition they held a conſultation, wherein it was reſolved, that they ſhould have recourſe to the proconſul, and make an abſolute ſurrender, ſince they could by no means hold out any longer. However, this reſolution was not univerſally approved. Great numbers choſe rather to die, than to give up their liberty; and ſhutting themſelves up in their houſes, there calmly waited for the fate, which hunger ſoon brought upon them. The reſt ſent a deputation to Scipio, who was touched with compaſſion at the ſight of thoſe unhappy men. There was ſomething inexpreſſibly wild in their air, and a ſavageneſs even in the manner they addreſſed him. As ſoon as they mentioned the word ſurrender, the proconſul received them graciouſly, and ordered them to bring all their arms to a place appointed the next day. But they demanded a longer time, which being granted, they ſet fire to their houſes, as ſome hiſtorians tell us; reduced their city to aſhes, and either killed one another, or periſhed in the flames; inſomuch, that not one of them remained alive to grace the proconſul's triumph. But Appian [a] aſſures us, that, two days after the time allotted, a conſiderable number of thoſe unhappy wretches came to the place appointed, and Numantia utterly deſtroyed.

[y] Liv. in epit. l. lvii. Appian. in Iberic. Oroſ l. iii. c. 7. Aul. Gell. l. xiii. c. 3.

Year of the Flood, 2871.
Before Chriſt 128.
Of Rome 620.

[z] Flor. l. ii. c. 12. Oros. l. v. c. 7. [a] Appian. in Iberic.

and ſurrendered their arms, and that Scipio, having reſerved fifty of them for his triumph, ſold the reſt to the beſt bidder. Be that as it will, thus much may be ſaid in honour of thoſe brave Spaniards, that, though they were few in number, no other people ſo long reſiſted the Roman forces, ſo often defeated the conſular armies, or brought ſo much diſgrace both on the generals and ſenate of Rome. Numantia, though infinitely inferior both to Carthage and Corinth, was much more glorious in her fall, than either of theſe proud cities. Scipio took Carthage ſword in hand; but did not think it poſſible to reduce Numantia otherwiſe than by famine. With this city fell all the hopes of the revolted Spaniards; ſo that the whole country immediately ſubmitted to the Roman yoke. Then the ſenate ſent ten of their body to ſettle the new province. But the Spaniards were too great lovers of liberty to continue long quiet. We ſhall ſee them often taking up arms and renewing the war, till the emperor Auguſtus entirely reduced them, and ſettled Spain, as well as the reſt of the then known world, in peace and tranquillity. Scipio on his return to Rome was honoured with a triumph; and on this occaſion the Roman people added the ſurname of Numantinus to that of Africanus.

NUMANTIA, while in being, had brought numberleſs diſaſters upon Rome; but, in ſome ſenſe, proved ſtill more fatal to her after her deſtruction. Her aſhes, if we may be allowed the expreſſion, ſtirred up the firſt ſedition, which polluted the capitol with blood, and was a prelude to thoſe cruel civil wars, which afterwards broke out ſucceſſively in the republic, and coſt her the lives of more citizens, than the conqueſt of the world. We mean the ſedition raiſed by Tib. Sempronius Gracchus, which it may not be improper to trace up to its firſt ſource. The Sempronian family, from which Tib. Gracchus was deſcended, was, though plebeian, one of the moſt illuſtrious in the commonwealth. Tib. Sempronius Gracchus, the father of this Gracchus, had been twice raiſed to the conſulate, was a great general, and had been honoured with two triumphs. But he was ſtill more renowned for his domeſtic virtues and probity, than for his birth or valour. He married the daughter of the firſt Africanus, that famous Cornelia, who was the pattern of her ſex, and the prodigy of her age, and had by her ſeveral children, of whom three only arrived to maturity of age, Tiberius Gracchus, Caius Gracchus, and a daughter, named Sempronia, who was married to the

The birth and education of Tib. Sempronius Gracchus.

Second Africanus. Tiberius the eldeſt was deemed the moſt accompliſhed youth in Rome, with reſpect to the qualities both of the body and mind. His extraordinary talents were heightened by a noble air, an engaging countenance, and all thoſe winning graces of nature which recommend merit. He made his firſt campaigns under his brother-in-law, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf upon all occaſions by his courage and the prudence of his conduct. When he returned to Rome, he applied himſelf to the ſtudy of eloquence, and at thirty years old was accounted the beſt orator of his age. He married the daughter of Appius Claudius, who had been formerly conſul and cenſor, and was then prince of the ſenate. He continued for ſome time in the ſentiments both of his own and his wife's family, and ſupported the intereſt of the patricians; but without openly attacking the popular faction. We have obſerved above, that he diſcharged the office of quæſtor in Spain, whither he attended the conſul Mancinus, and ſhared with him the misfortunes of that unhappy campaign. He was the chief author and negotiator of that ſhameful, but neceſſary, peace with the Numantines. The ſenate, with the utmoſt injuſtice, diſannulled the treaty, and condemned the conſul, the quæſtor, and all the officers, who had ſigned it, to be delivered up to the Numantines. The people indeed, out of eſteem for Gracchus, would not ſuffer him to be ſacrificed; but however, he had juſt reaſon to complain both of the ſenate and people, for paſſing ſo ſcandalous a decree againſt his general and himſelf, and breaking a treaty, whereby the lives of ſo many citizens had been ſaved. But, as the ſenate had chiefly promoted ſuch baſe and iniquitous proceedings, he reſolved in due time to ſhew his reſentment againſt the party, which had moſt contributed to his diſgrace. In order to this, he ſtood for the tribuneſhip of the people, which he no ſooner obtained, than he reſolved to attack the nobility in the moſt tender part. They had uſurped lands unjuſtly; cultivated them by ſlaves to the great detriment of the republic, and had lived for about two hundred and fifty years in open defiance to the Licinian law, by which it was enacted, that no citizen ſhould poſſeſs more than five hundred acres. This law Tib. Gracchus reſolved to revive, and by that means revenge himſelf on the patricians. But it was not revenge alone which prompted him to embarque in ſo dangerous an attempt. It is pretended, that his mother Cornelia animated him to undertake ſomething worthy of his and her family. I am

He undertakes the revival of the Licinian law.

commonly commonly called, said she, by way of honour, the mother-in-law of the Second Africanus. Why don't they style me the mother of Gracchus? It is because your name is not so illustrious as to reflect any honour upon me. For your own sake then, and for your mother's, make yourself famous by some great attempt. These reproaches of his mother, the authority of some great men, namely his father-in-law Appius Claudius, of P. Crassus, the Pontifex Maximus, and of Mucius Scævola, the most learned civilian in Rome, and his natural thirst after glory, joined with an eager desire of revenge, conspired to draw him into this most unfortunate scheme. The law, as he first drew it up, was very mild; for it only enacted, that those, who possessed more than five hundred acres of land, should part with the overplus, and that the full value of the said lands should be paid them out of the public treasury. The lands, thus purchased by the public, were to be divided among the poor citizens, and cultivated either by themselves, or by freemen, who were upon the spot. Tiberius allowed every child of a family to hold two hundred and fifty acres in his own name, over and above what was allowed to the father. Nothing could be more mild than this new law, since by the Licinian he might have absolutely deprived the rich of the lands they unjustly possessed, and made them accountable for the profits they had received from them during their long possession. But the rich patricians could not so much as bear the name of the Licinian law, though thus qualified. Those chiefly of the senatorial and equestrian order exclaimed against it, and were continually mounting the rostra one after another, in order to dissuade the people from accepting a law, which, they said, would raise disturbances, that might prove more dangerous than the evils, which Tiberius pretended to redress by the promulgation of it. Thus the zealous tribune was obliged day after day to enter the lists with fresh adversaries; but he ever got the better of them, both in point of eloquence and argument. He often intermixed with his solid arguments such topics, as were most proper to make impressions on the multitude. The wild beasts, said he, have dens and caverns to retire to; while the citizens of Rome have not so much as a roof or a cottage to shelter them from the inclemency of the weather; nay, not so much as ground enough to serve them for a grave. On the other hand, the rich insisted on the length of their possession, on the debts they had contracted by purchasing these theſe lands, and on the ſtrange confuſion which ſuch a change would occaſion in families, ſince theſe eſtates were ſettled on their wives and children. But Gracchus anſwered all their objections, ſo clearly and fully, as left no room for any reply. Cicero, who read the ſpeeches of Gracchus, tells us, that he admired them more for the ingenious turns and ſolid reaſons he found in them, than for the purity of the language, which was not yet in its perfection [b]. The people were charmed to hear him maintain the cauſe of the unfortunate with ſo much ſucceſs, and beſtowed on him the higheſt commendations. The rich therefore had recourſe to violence and calumny, in order to deſtroy, or at leaſt to diſcredit, the tribune. It is ſaid, they hired aſſaſſins to diſpatch him; but they could not put their wicked deſign in execution, Gracchus being always attended, to and from the roſtra, by a guard of about four thouſand men. His adverſaries therefore endeavoured to ruin his reputation by the blackeſt calumnies. They gave out, that he aimed at monarchy, and publiſhed pretended plots laid for crowning him king. But the people, without giving ear to ſuch groundleſs reports, made it their whole buſineſs to encourage their tribune, who was hazarding his life and reputation for their ſake [c].

The Sempronian law.

Gracchus gains the favour of the people.

When the day came, on which this law was to be accepted or rejected by the people aſſembled in the comitium, Gracchus began with haranguing the mighty croud, which an affair of ſo much importance had brought together both from the city and country. In his ſpeech he ſhewed the juſtice of the law with ſo much eloquence, made ſo moving a deſcription of the miſeries of the meaner ſort of people, and at the ſame time ſet forth in ſuch odious colours the uſurpation of the public lands, and the immenſe riches which the avarice and rapaciouſneſs of the great had raked together, that the people, tranſported with fury, demanded with loud cries the billets, that they might give their ſuffrages. Then Gracchus, finding the minds of the citizens in that warmth and emotion, which was neceſſary for the ſucceſs of his deſign, ordered the law to be read. But unluckily, one of the tribunes, by name Marcus Octavius Cæcina, who had always profeſſed a great friendſhip for Gracchus, having been gained over by the patricians, declared againſt the proceedings of his friend and collegue, collegue, and pronounced the word which had been always awful in the mouth of a tribune of the people, Veto, I forbid it. As Octavius was a man of an unblameable character, and had hitherto been very zealous in the publication of the law, Gracchus was greatly surprised at this unexpected opposition from his friend. However, he kept his temper, and only desired the people to assemble again the next day, to hear their two tribunes, one in defence of, the other in opposition to, the law proposed. The people met at the time appointed, when Gracchus, addressing himself to his collegue, conjured him by the mutual duties of their function, and by the bonds of their antient friendship, not to oppose the good of the people, whom they were bound in honour to protect against the usurpations of the great: nay, taking his collegue aside, he addressed him thus; Perhaps you are personally concerned to oppose this law; if so, I mean, if you have more than the five hundred acres allowed, I myself, poor as I am, engage to pay you in money what you will lose in land. But Octavius, either out of shame, or from a principle of honour, continued immoveable in the party he had embraced. Gracchus therefore had recourse to another expedient, which was to suspend all the magistrates of Rome from the execution of their offices. It was lawful for any tribune to take this step, when the passing of the law, which he proposed, was prevented by mere chicanery. After this he assembled the people anew, and made a second attempt to succeed in his design. When all things were got ready for collecting the suffrages, the rich privately conveyed away the urns, in which the tablets were kept. This kindled the tribune's indignation, and the rage of the people. A thousand confused noises arose in the assembly. The comitium was like to become a field of battle, when two venerable senators, Manlius and Fulvius, very reasonably interposed, and throwing themselves at the tribune's feet, prevailed upon him to submit his law to the judgment of the conscript fathers. This was making the senators judges in their own cause; but Gracchus thought the law so undeniably just, that he could not persuade himself that they would reject it; and if they did, he knew the incensed multitude would no longer keep any measures with them [d].

[b] Cic. in Bruto. [c] Liv. epit. l. lviii. Plut. in Gracch. Appian. de bell. civil. l. i, Aul. Gell. l. ii. c. 13.

Gracchus suspends all the magistrates from their functions.

Gracchus submits his law to the judgment of the senate.

THE

[d] Plut. in Gracch. Appian. de bell. civil. l. i. Liv. epit. l. lviii.

THE ſenate, who wanted nothing but to gain time, affected delays, and came to no reſolution. There were indeed ſome among them, who, out of a principle of equity, were for paying ſome regard to the complaints of the tribune, and for ſacrificing their own intereſt to the relief of the diſtreſſed. But the far greater part would not hear of any compoſition whatſoever. Hereupon Gracchus brought the affair anew before the people, and earneſtly entreated his collegue Octavius to drop his oppoſition in compaſſion to the many unfortunate people, for whom he interceded. He put him in mind of their antient friendſhip, took him by the hand, and affectionately embraced him. But ſtill Octavius was inflexible. Hereupon Gracchus took an unjuſt, ſay ſome authors, but neceſſary ſtep, to remove all oppoſition, and leave the people at liberty to vote. He reſolved to deprive Octavius of his tribuneſhip, ſince he alone obſtinately withſtood the deſires of the whole body of ſo great a people. Having therefore aſſembled the people, he told them, that ſince his collegue and he were divided in opinion, and the republic ſuffered by their diviſion, it was the province of the tribes aſſembled in comitia to re-eſtabliſh concord among their tribunes. If the cauſe I maintain, ſaid he, be, in your opinion, unjuſt, I am ready to give up my ſeat in the college. On the contrary, if you judge me worthy of being continued in your ſervice in this ſtation, deprive him of the tribuneſhip, who alone obſtructs my wiſhes. As ſoon as you ſhall have nominated one to ſucceed him, the law will paſs without oppoſition. Having thus ſpoke, he diſmiſſed the aſſembly, after having ſummoned them to meet again the next day.

Brings it again before the people.

AND now, Gracchus, being ſoured with the oppoſition he had met with from the rich and from his obſtinate collegue, and being well appriſed that the law would paſs in any form, in which he ſhould think fit to propoſe it, reſolved to revive it, as it was at firſt paſſed, without abating any thing of its ſeverity. There was no exception in favour of the children in families; or reimburſement promiſed to thoſe who ſhould part with the lands they poſſeſſed above five hundred acres. The next day, the people being aſſembled in vaſt crowds on this extraordinary occaſion, Gracchus made freſh applications to Octavius; but to no purpoſe; he obſtinately perſiſted in his oppoſition. Then Gracchus, turning to the people, Judge you, ſaid he, which of us deſerves to be deprived of his office. At theſe words the firſt tribe voted, and declared for the depoſition of of Octavius. Upon which Gracchus, ſuſpending the ardor of the tribes, made another effort to bring over his opponent by gentle methods. But all his endeavours proving ineffectual, the other tribes went on to vote in their turns, and followed the example of the firſt. Of five-and-thirty tribes, ſeventeen had already declared againſt Octavius, and the eighteenth was juſt going to determine the affair, when Gracchus, being willing to try once more whether he could reclaim his collegue, ſuſpended the collecting of the ſuffrages; and addreſſing Octavius in the moſt preſſing terms, conjured him not to expoſe himſelf, by his obſtinacy, to ſo great a diſgrace, nor to give him the grief of having caſt a blemiſh upon his collegue and friend, which neither time nor merit would wipe off. Hearken, dear Octavius, ſaid he, hearken rather to the advice of a faithful friend, than to a factious cabal, who are intereſted to ſeduce you. Be perſuaded to follow the inclinations of the Roman people. It is ſtill in your power to reconcile yourſelf to them, and gain their affections for ever. Octavius could not hear theſe words without concern. He is ſaid to have wept, and to have continued ſome time in ſuſpenſe. But having unluckily caſt his eyes on the ſenators there preſent, he was aſhamed to break his word with them; and therefore reſuming his former ſteadineſs, he boldly anſwered Tiberius, that he might go on with the work he had begun. At theſe words, the eighteenth tribe voted, Octavius was depoſed, and the law paſſed, as Gracchus had propoſed it the laſt time. The depoſed tribune was dragged from the roſtra by the incenſed multitude, who would have inſulted him further, had not the ſenators and his friends facilitated his eſcape [c].

Octavius depoſed, and the law paſſed.

The Licinian law being thus revived, with one conſent both by the city and country tribes, Gracchus cauſed the people to appoint triumvirs, or three commiſſioners to haſten its execution. In this commiſſion the people gave Gracchus the firſt place, and he had intereſt enough to get his father-in-law Appius Claudius and his brother Caius Gracchus appointed to be his collegues. Theſe three ſpent the whole ſummer in travelling through all the Italian provinces, to examine what lands were held by any perſon above five hundred acres, in order to divide them among the poor citizens. When Gracchus returned from his progreſs, he found found by the death of his chief agent, that his abſence had not abated either the hatred of the rich, or the love of the poor, toward him. As it plainly appeared, that the deceaſed had been poiſoned, the tribune took this occaſion to apply himſelf again to his protectors, and implore their aſſiſtance againſt the violence and treachery of his enemies. The populace more attached, after this accident, to their hero, than ever, declared they would ſtand by him to the laſt drop of their blood; and this their zeal encouraged him to add a new clauſe to the law, viz. that the commiſſioners ſhould likewiſe enquire, what lands had been uſurped from the republic. This was touching the ſenators in a moſt tender point, for moſt of them had appropriated to themſelves lands belonging to the republic. But after all, the tribune, upon a ſtrict enquiry, found, that the lands taken from the rich would not be enough to content all the poor citizens. But the following accident eaſed him of this difficulty, and enabled him to ſtop the murmurs of the malecontents among the people. Attalus Philometor, king of Pergamus, having bequeathed his dominions and effects to the Romans, Eudemus the Pergamean brought his treaſures to Rome at this time; and Gracchus immediately got a new law paſſed, enacting, that this money ſhould be divided among the poor citizens, who could not have lands; and that the diſpoſal of the revenues of Pergamus ſhould not be in the ſenate, but in the comitia. By theſe ſteps Gracchus moſt effectually humbled the ſenate, who, in order to diſcredit him among the people, gave out, that Eudemus, who had brought the king's will to Rome, had left with Gracchus the royal diadem and mantle of Attalus, which the law-making tribune was to uſe when he ſhould be proclaimed king of Rome. But theſe reports only ſerved to make Gracchus be more upon his guard, and to inſpire the people with an implacable hatred againſt the rich, who were the authors of them. Gracchus, being now, by his power over the minds of the multitude, abſolute maſter of their ſuffrages, formed a deſign of raiſing his father-in-law Appius Claudius to the conſulate the next year, of promoting his brother Caius to the tribuneſhip, and getting himſelf continued in the ſame office. The laſt was what moſt nearly concerned him, his perſon, ſo long as he was in office, being ſacred and inviolable. As the ſenate was very active in endeavouring to get ſuch only elected into the college of tribunes, as were enemies to Gracchus and his faction, the tribune left no ſtone unturned to ſecure his election. He told told the people, that the rich had reſolved to aſſaſſinate him as ſoon as he was out of his office; he appeared in mourning, as was the cuſtom in the greateſt calamities; and bringing his children yet young into the forum, recommended them to the people in ſuch terms, as ſhewed that he deſpaired of his own preſervation. At this ſight the populace returned no anſwer but by outcries and menaces againſt the rich. When the day appointed for the election of new tribunes came, the people were ordered to aſſemble in the capitol, in the great court before the temple of Jupiter. The tribes being met, Gracchus propoſed his petition, entreating the people to continue him one year longer in the office of tribune, in conſideration of the great danger to which he was expoſed, the rich having vowed his deſtruction as ſoon as his perſon ſhould be no more ſacred. This was indeed an unuſual requeſt, it having been long cuſtomary not to continue any tribune in his office above a year. However, the tribes began to vote, and the two firſt declared for Gracchus. Hereupon the rich made great clamours, and ſome of their faction, who were poſted in different places, cried out, Juſtice. juſtice! theſe men are going to overturn all the laws. No man can hold the office of tribune two years together. Theſe clamours terrified Rubrius Varro, who preſided in the college of tribunes that day, to ſuch a degree, that he reſigned his place to Q. Mummius, who offered to preſide in his room. But this raiſed a tumult among the tribunes themſelves, ſome pretending, that the preſident had no right to diſpoſe of his place, which it belonged to the whole college to do by a majority of votes. As the tribunes began to diſpute the legality of this act, with great warmth among themſelves, Gracchus wiſely diſmiſſed the aſſembly, and ordered them to meet again the next day.

[c] Plut. & Appian. ibid.

Gracchus divides the treaſures of king Attalus among the people.

Solicits the tribuneſhip for another year.

In the mean time, the people, being ſenſible of what importance it was to them to preſerve the life of ſo powerful a protector, not only conducted him home, but watched by turns all night at his door. Next morning by break of day, Gracchus, having aſſembled his friends, led them from his houſe, and poſted one half of them in the comitium, while he went up himſelf with the other to the capitol. As ſoon as he appeared, the people ſaluted him with loud acclamations of joy. But ſcarce was he placed in his tribunal, when Fulvius Flaccus, a ſenator and friend to Gracchus, breaking through the croud, came up to him, and gave him notice, that the ſenators, who were aſſembled bled in the temple of Faith, which almoſt touched that of Jupiter Capitolinus, had conſpired againſt his life, and were reſolved to attack him openly on his very tribunal. Hereupon Gracchus tucked up his robe, as it were, to prepare for a battle; and, after his example, ſome of his party, ſeizing the ſtaves of the apparitors, prepared to defend themſelves, and to repel force by force. Theſe preparations terrified the other tribunes, who immediately abandoned their places in a cowardly manner, and mixed with the croud; while the prieſts ran to ſhut the gates of the temple for fear of its being profaned. On the other hand, the friends of Gracchus, who were diſperſed by parties in different places, cried out, We are ready: What muſt we we do? Gracchus, whoſe voice could not be heard by all his adherents on account of the tumult, the clamours, and the confuſed cries of the different parties, put his hand to his head; which was the ſignal agreed on to prepare for a battle. But ſome of his enemies, putting a malicious conſtruction upon that geſture, immediately flew to the ſenate, and told the fathers, that the ſeditious tribune had called for the crown to be put upon his head. Hereupon the ſenators, fancying they already ſaw the king of Pergamus's diadem on the tribune's head, and the royal mantle on his ſhoulders, reſolved to give the conſul leave to arm his legions, treat the friends of Gracchus as enemies, and turn the comitium into a field of battle. But the conſul Mucius Scævola, who was a prudent and moderate man, refuſed to be the inſtrument of their raſh revenge, and to diſhonour his conſulate with the maſſacre of a diſarmed people. As Calpurnius Piſo, the other conſul, was then in Sicily, the moſt turbulent among the ſenators cried out, Since one of our conſuls is abſent, and the other betrays the republic, let us do our ſelves juſtice; let us immediately go and demoliſh with our own hands this idol of the people. Scipio Naſica was the great grandſon of Cneius Scipio, the uncle of the firſt Africanus, and conſequently couſin to the Gracchi by their mother Cornelia. But nevertheleſs not one of the ſenators betrayed a more irreconcileable hatred againſt the tribune than he. When the prudent conſul refuſed to arm his legions, and put the adherents of Gracchus to death, contrary to the uſual forms of juſtice, he ſet no bounds to his fury, but, riſing up from his place, cried out like a madman; Since our conſul betrays us, let thoſe who love the republic follow me. Having uttered theſe words, he immediately walked out of the temple

temple, attended by a great number of ſenators. Naſica threw his robe over his ſhoulders, and, having covered his head with it, advanced with his followers into the croud, where he was joined by a company of the clients and friends of the patricians, armed with ſtaves and clubs. Theſe, falling indifferently upon all who ſtood in their way, diſperſed the croud. Many of Gracchus's party took to their heels, and, in that tumult all the ſeats being overturned and broken, Naſica, armed with the leg of a broken bench, knocked down all who oppoſed him, and at length reached Gracchus. One of his party ſeized the tribune by the lappet of his robe; but he, quitting his gown, fled in his tunic, and as he was in that hurry of ſpirits, which is inſeparable from fear, leaping over the broken benches, he had the misfortune to ſlip and fall. As he was getting up again, he received a blow on the head, which ſtunned him; then his adverſaries, ruſhing in upon him, with repeated blows, put an end to his life. Some hiſtorians pretend, that Naſica with his own hand completed the work, which had been begun by his advice, and under his conduct. Others ſay, that Publius Satureius and Lucius Rubrius, or, as Plutarch calls him, Lucius Rufus, two of his collegues, ſecretly jealous of his glory, gave him the two blows that diſpatched him. However that be, Rome was by his death delivered, according to Cicero, from a domeſtic enemy, who was more formidable to her, than even that Numantia which had firſt kindled his reſentments. Perhaps no man was ever born with greater talents, or more capable of aggrandizing himſelf, and doing honour to his country. But his great mind, his manly courage, his lively, eaſy, and powerful eloquence, were, ſays Cicero, like a ſword in the hands of a madman. Gracchus abuſed them, not in ſupporting an unjuſt cauſe, but in conducting a good one with too much violence. He went ſo far as to make ſome believe, that he had really ſomething in view beſides the intereſt of the people, whom he pretended to relieve; and therefore ſome hiſtorians have repreſented him as a tyrant. But the moſt judicious writers clear him from this imputation, and aſcribe his firſt deſign of reviving the Licinian law to an eager deſire of being revenged on the ſenators for the affront they had very unjuſtly put upon him and the conſul Mancinus, as we have hinted above. The law he attempted to revive had an air of juſtice, which gave a ſanction to his revenge, without caſting any blemiſh on his reputation. The death of Gracchus did not put an end to the tumult. Above three hundred of the tribune's friends loſt their lives in the fray, and their bodies were thrown with that of Gracchus into the Tiber. Nay, the ſenate carried their revenge beyond the fatal day, which had ſtained the capitol with Roman blood. They ſought for all the friends of the late tribune, and without any form of law aſſaſſinated ſome, and forced others into baniſhment. Caius Billius, one of the moſt zealous defenders of the people, was ſeized by his enemies, and ſhut up in a caſk with ſnakes and vipers, where he miſerably periſhed. Though the laws prohibited any citizen to take away the life of another, before he had been legally condemned, Naſica and his followers were acquitted by the ſenate, who enacted a decree, juſtifying all the cruelties committed againſt Gracchus and his adherents [f].

A fray enſues.

Gracchus is killed.

The cruel death of CaiusBillius.

In the mean time the people, being recovered from their fear, reproached themſelves with the death of their tribune, as not having defended him with ſufficient courage. They inveighed chiefly againſt Scipio Naſica, the author of the tumult, upbraiding him publickly with murder and ſacrilege. Some threatened to murder him; others were for ſummoning him before the aſſembly of the people, and trying him for his life. The ſenate therefore, fearing leſt his preſence might raiſe a new ſedition, thought proper to remove him: and accordingly ſent him, under pretence of an embaſſy, into Aſia, though his office of pontifex maximus obliged him not to go out of Italy. He rambled about a great while in different parts of the Levant, till at length, worn out with trouble, he died at Pergamus. By his abſence the fire of ſedition was rather ſtifled than extinguiſhed. The people ſtill maintained the law, which Gracchus had paſſed in their favour, and nominated a new commiſſioner in his room to finiſh the diſtribution of the lands which he had begun. The perſon they pitched upon was P. Craſſus, whoſe daughter Caius Gracchus, brother to Tiberius, had lately married. On the other hand the patricians, to keep off the execution of the law, found means to bring into the college of tribunes a creature of their own, Q. Pompeius Rufus, one of Gracchus's moſt violent enemies. In the mean time the conſular year being near expired, the election was made without any diſturbance in the uſual place, and the ſupreme magiſtracy conferred on Publiu

Scipio Naſica is ſent into Aſia.

[f] Plut. in Gracch. Appian. de bell civil. l. i. Oroſ. l. v. c. 8 Cic. de off. l. i. c. 21. & de orat. l. ii.

Publius Popilius Lænas, and P. Rupilius. It fell to the lot of Popilius to continue in Italy, and keep the citizens of Rome in awe, while his collegue ſet out for Sicily to make war with the revolted ſlaves in that iſland. We ſhall follow him thither, and take a view of the origin and progreſs of this rebellion, which brought more calamities on the Sicilians, than all the ravages and devaſtations of their old enemies the Carthaginians.

The war of the ſlaves in Sicily.

In Sicily the great men of the iſland, or the Roman knights, who had the management of the public revenues, having, by degrees, engroſſed all the great eſtates to themſelves, out of avarice employed in the culture of their lands ſlaves inſtead of freemen, to whom they ſcarce allowed neceſſaries; ſo that thoſe unfortunate men, being obliged to provide for themſelves, learnt to live by rapine. As they frequently met together in companies to plunder the houſes in the country, or to rob the travellers on the great roads, they came at length to deliberate how to deliver themſelves from ſlavery. They were almoſt as numerous as the natives themſelves, and therefore wanted only a leader to appear at their head, and conduct the conſpiracy. A Sicilian lord, named Antigines, had amongſt his ſlaves one by name Eunus, who was very fit for this purpoſe. He was a native of Apamea in Syria, and having been taken priſoner in war, had paſſed through the hands of ſeveral maſters, till at length he was brought into Sicily. He was a vigilant, active man, full of fire, and pretending to have a conſtant intercourſe with the gods by dreams and apparitions, was conſulted by his fellow ſlaves as an oracle. The Sicilians in general exerciſed a kind of tyranny over their ſlaves; but a citizen of Enna, a city in the center of the iſland, by name Damophilus, had made himſelf more odious than the reſt, by his cruelties, to a great number of thoſe unhappy wretches who cultivated his immenſe poſſeſſions. They were all marked with an hot iron in their foreheads, ſhut up every night in cloſe priſons, and led out early in the morning to their daily labour in the fields, though at the ſame time they were ſcarce allowed the neceſſary proviſions to ſupport themſelves. On the other hand Megallis, the wife of Damophilus, was no leſs cruel towards the ſlaves of her ſex, exacting their taſks with inſupportable rigor, and cauſing them to be unmercifully whipt for the leaſt fault. Theſe two tyrants had a daughter, who was very different from themſelves: tho' ſhe was very young, ſhe had good-nature enough to pity the afflicted; she often alleviated their sufferings, appeased her furious mother, supplied, as far as she was able, the wants of the necessitous, and, in short, was the only refuge of those unhappy men. We are sorry history has not transmitted to us the name of this humane and virtuous young woman. The oppressed slaves, not being able to bear any longer the unspeakable miseries they groaned under, entered into a plot against the authors of them. But in order to secure themselves success, they first went to consult Eunus, who, with a solemn prophetic tone, pronounced, that the enterprise was agreeable to the gods, and that it would be attended with success, provided they did not delay the execution of it. He offered to conduct it himself; and the slaves, overjoyed to have such a man at their head, assembled in great haste to the number of four hundred on Damophilus's estate, armed with forks, hooks, and other instruments of husbandry, and marching directly to Enna, surprised and pillaged it. The slaves in the city joined their comrades, and committed barbarities not to be expressed. The men were massacred, the women dishonoured, and even the children at the breast dashed on the ground, and trod under foot. As Damophilus was gone with his wife and daughter to take the air in a garden near the city, Eunus, who had taken upon him the office of general, sent a party to seize them, which was done with circumstances of great barbarity. However, they treated the daughter with all the respect which was due to her virtue. So true it is, that good-nature commands regard even from the most furious[g].

Eunus heads the revolted slaves, and seizes Enna.

Eunus, being now master of Enna, assembled the slaves he commanded in the public theatre; and having erected there a kind of tribunal, ordered Damophilus and his wife to be brought before him, in order to be tried. Some of the slaves were accusers, others witnesses, and the multitude judges. Eunus presided, and gave the accused leave to speak their defence. But while Damophilus was endeavouring to raise compassion, and some began to shew pity for him, Hermias and Zeuzis, two of his slaves, whom he had treated with great cruelty, came up to him, and with repeated blows dispatched him. His wife Megallis was sentenced to be delivered up to the slaves of her own sex, whom she had treated without mercy. These furies set no bound to their cruelty, inflicted on their mistress every torment which which revenge could invent; and at length after having satiated their rage, threw her down a precipice, which put an end to her unhappy life. As for the daughter, she was treated with the utmost respect, conducted with the unanimous consent of all to Catana, and there delivered untouched into the hands of her relations. In the mean time Eunus, finding he could not pretend to assume a perfect authority over such untractable people, without being invested with sovereign power, prevailed upon the multitude to proclaim him king. The first orders the new king gave were very cruel; for he caused all the inhabitants of Enna to be barbarously murdered, saying, that there could never be any real concord between freemen and slaves. After this, having got into his power Antigines and Pithon, who had successively been his masters, he put them to death with his own hand. He then assumed all the ensigns of royalty, changed his name of Eunus into that of Antiochus, gave the title of queen to his wife, who was a Syrian, and a slave as well as himself, and applied himself to settle a kind of government among his new subjects. His regulations drew above six thousand slaves to Enna in less than three days, armed with such weapons as came first to their hands, viz. spits, axes, saws, poles, &c. At the head of these Eunus took the field, and committed every-where most dreadful ravages. The people, whose houses were burnt, and lands laid waste, came in flocks to the Roman prætor, who governed the island, imploring his assistance. Manlius, who was governor of Sicily in the year of Rome 615, when this sedition first broke out, marched against the rebels with one legion, the usual army of prætors, who resided in peaceable provinces, but he was defeated, and his camp taken and plundered. The same misfortune happened to the prætors P. Cornelius Lentulus and Caius Calpurnius Piso, whom the republic sent into the island the two following years. The news of these advantages being spread all over the island, the new king's forces daily encreased. Among the rest, one Cleon, a native of Cilicia, joined him with five thousand men; others came from the most distant parts of the island at the head of considerable bodies to support, under the banners of Eunus, the common cause: insomuch, that when the prætor L. Plautius Hypsæus landed in Sicily, he found above seventy thousand slaves in arms under the command of Eunus, besides those who had assembled under other leaders in different places; so that the whole number of armed slaves in the island amounted to Eunus proclaimed king.

[g] Liv. epit. l. lvi. Dodor. Sicul. in excerpt. Flor. l. iii. c. 19

He gains great advantages over the Roman prætors.

two hundred thouſand. As Hypſæus had only eight thouſand men in his army, he no ſooner appeared in the field, than he was attacked, and entirely defeated. The rebels, elated with this victory, laid ſiege to Taurominium, a city of great ſtrength, and having ſoon reduced it, made it their magazine of arms, and place of refuge. At length the republic, alarmed at the progreſs the rebels made in the beginning of the year 619, ordered C. Fulvius, collegue in the conſulate to the ſecond Africanus, into Sicily, to ſuppreſs this conſpiracy, which began now to be formidable. But whether he gained any advantages over the rebels, hiſtory has not informed us. In the following year 620, the conſul L. Calpurnius Piſo (W), to whoſe lot Sicily fell, attacked the Syrians, for ſo the rebellious ſlaves were commonly called, under the walls of Meſſana, which city they had inveſted, put them to the rout for the firſt time, obliged them to raiſe the ſiege, and killed above ſix thouſand of them on the ſpot. But though Piſo conquered the rebels, he had not the glory of entirely reducing them. This was reſerved for P. Rupilius, who was choſen conſul for the preſent year. He opened the campaign with the ſiege of Taurominium. As this city was ſituated on a high and ſteep hill, and difficult of acceſs on all ſides, the conſul reſolved to reduce it by famine. With this view he drew a line of circumvallation round the mountain, and by that means cut off all communication with the neighbouring country. As the garriſon was very numerous, proviſions ſoon began to fail them; and then want added to their obſtinacy produced many tragical events. They killed and devoured one another, but, as they could expect no pardon, ſtill perſiſted obſtinate. At length the city was betrayed to the Romans by a Syrian ſlave, named Sarapion; and the governor,

And takes Tauromini-um.

C. Fulvius ſent againſt the ſlaves.

Taurominium betrayed to the Romans.

(W) This Calpurnius Piſo is ſaid to have been the author of the famous law De repetundis againſt the avarice of magiſtrates, who robbed the public. While he was prætor in Sicily, there being a great ſcarcity of corn at Rome, the ſenate charged him to buy up a great quantity all over that iſland; which he did with ſuch diſintereſtedneſs as acquired him the glorious ſurname of Frugi, that is, The honeſt. He remitted to the public treaſury a conſiderable part of the money which had been ſent him for this purpoſe, and managed the reſt with ſuch prudence and frugality, as to provide with it for the wants of the public (31).

(31) Cic. in Verr. act 3.

governor, with all his garriſon were, by the conſul's orders, thrown down headlong from the top of a rock. From Tauromínium the conſul led his army to Enna, where the pretended king had ſhut himſelf up with Cleon, and the flower of his troops. This place likewiſe Rupilius reſolved to reduce by famine; and accordingly inveſted it on all ſides. The beſieged, being ſoon reduced to great ſtreights, made ſeveral ſallies, attempting to break through the enemy; but though they fought like men in deſpair, they were conſtantly repulſed by the Romans. In one of theſe ſallies, Cleon fell alive into the conſul's hands, covered with wounds and blood, but did not long ſurvive his captivity. His empaled body was expoſed to the view of the beſieged to encreaſe their terror. At length Enna likewiſe was treacherouſly delivered up to the conſul, whoſe troops put all the ſlaves they found in the place to the ſword. We are told, that at the taking of theſe two cities above twenty thouſand of the rebels loſt their lives. As for Eunus, when he ſaw the Romans maſters of the walls, he put himſelf at the head of his guards, conſiſting of about ſix hundred men, forced his way through the legionaries, fled for refuge to a ſteep, and there prepared to ſell his life dear. He was purſued cloſe, and ſurrounded in his retreat by the conſular troops; and then it appeared, that there was more oſtentation than true courage in his ſervile ſoul. The ſoldiers of his guard agreed to kill one another. But their king concealed himſelf among the rocks, and was at laſt taken alive out of a cave with four of his domeſtics, and delivered up to the conſul, who ſent them to Murgantia, to be ſtrictly guarded there, till the departure of the Roman army. Rupilius reſerved Eunus, not ſo much to grace his triumph, as to ſhew the Romans the chief they had ſo much dreaded with ſo little reaſon. But he fell ſick, and died in priſon, worn out with grief, and devoured with vermin [h]. Rupilius continued ſome time in Sicily in quality of proconſul; retook the cities which were ſtill in the hands of the rebels; reſtored the fugitive ſlaves to ther maſters; and laſtly, drew up a new code of laws for the Sicilians, which were ever after obſerved to the great ſatisfaction of the whole iſland. Having ſettled his province in peace, he returned to

And alſo Enna.

Eunus taken priſoner.

Eunus dies in priſon.

[h] Diodor. Sicul. in eclog. Flor. l. iii c. 19. Front. ſtrat. l. iv. c. 1. Val. Max. l. ii. c. 7. & l. iv. c. 3. Cic. pro Fonteio, & in Verr. act. 6, to Rome; but refuſed a triumph, being aſhamed to have it recorded in the triumphal tables, that he had overcome ſlaves. He was one of thoſe great and diſintereſted men, who had the virtue of the firſt ages of Rome. The only glory he ſought was, that of promoting the public good; and the only reward he deſired was, the conſciouſneſs of having ſerved his country [1].

DURING the war in Sicily, Andronicus, the illegitimate ſon of Eumenes, laid claim to the kingdom of Pergamus, which Attalus was ſaid to have bequeathed to the Romans; and having ſeized it, put himſelf in a condition to maintain a war with Rome, which we have deſcribed at length in our hiſtory of the kingdom of Pergamus. The next year, P. Licinius Craſſus and Valerius Flaccus were choſen conſuls; the former was pontifex maximus, and the latter flamen Martialis, that is, high-prieſt of Mars; ſo that Rome was now for the firſt time governed by two perſons devoted to the ſervice of the gods. This ſame year two plebeians, Q. Cæcilius Metellus, ſurnamed Macedonicus, and Q. Pompeius were choſen cenſors. It had been an invariable cuſtom in Rome for two hundred and twenty years to chuſe one of the cenſors out of the patricians, and the other out of the plebeians. But now the patricians, probably to ſoften the people, ſuffered them to raiſe two of their body to this eminent dignity, which had never happened before. In the cenſus, which theſe two plebeians took of the citizens of Rome, they found 317823 men able to bear arms; and their cenſorſhip was famous for a law, which they got paſſed, obliging all Romans to marry at a certain age.

Two plebeians choſen cenſors.

IN the mean time, the diſturbances about the Sempronian law were continued by the tribune Carbo, who was continually complaining to the people of the chicaneries of the rich in oppoſing the execution of it. One day he publicly aſked the great Scipio Africanus what he thought of the murder of Sempronius Gracchus his brother-in-law, not doubting, but he would condemn the authors of his death; but, to his great ſurpriſe, Scipio anſwered, that if Gracchus had endeavoured to ſow diſcord in the republic, he thought him lawfully put to death. Upon this unexpected anſwer, the tribun[illegible]irred up the people to inſult the moſt venerable man in [illegible] But Sci[illegible] aſſuming an aſcendant over the multitude [illegible]e ſilent, ſa[illegible], ye untractable people. Think ye ye that I am afraid of your murmurs, who have been ſo often unconcerned at the fury of your enemies? At theſe words the unruly multitude began to hiſs him, which that brave commander not being able to bear, Miſerable wretches, ſaid he, exalting his voice, What would have become of you, had it not been for my father Paulus Æmilius, and myſelf? you would have been enſlaved by your enemies, and ſpent your unhappy lives in a ſtate of ſubjection. And is this the reſpect you owe your deliverers; Is this your gratitude? Theſe words, uttered with that authority, which the long command of armies gives a general, ſilenced the multitude, and made the moſt ſeditious tremble like ſlaves. The comitia were immediately diſſolved, and every one returned home with more eſteem, but leſs affection, for the great Scipio. After this the illuſtrious Roman retired to one of his country-houſes at Gaieta with his dear Lælius. There theſe two inſeparable friends, who had diſcharged with glory the higheſt offices in the republic, amuſed themſelves with the ſame little innocent pleaſures which had diverted them when children. They walked by the ſea-ſide, entertained themſelves with picking up ſmooth flat ſtones, and throwing them on the ſurface of the water, and enjoyed more pleaſure in this ſweet retirement, than they had done at the head of the republic and her armies [k].

New diſturbances about the Sempronian law.

[1] C[illegible] in Ver. act. ii.

In the mean time, Carbo, more active than ever in ſupporting the intereſts of the people, having prevailed upon them to continue him in his office another year, propoſed a law, enacting that the ſame perſons ſhould hold the tribuneſhip during the pleaſure of the people, without coming to an annual election. But Scipio and Lælius, upon the report of this new ſtorm, haſtened to Rome, oppoſed the law with all their intereſt, and got it rejected. In the following conſulate of Claudius Pulcher and M. Perperna, a ſoldier of fortune, and not ſo much as a Roman citizen, the diſturbances of Rome were daily encreaſed by the tribunes. Caius Atinius Labeo, who was at the head of the college, ſeized Q. Cæcilius Metellus the cenſor, who had refuſed him a place in the ſenate, at noon-day, and immediately pronounced ſentence of death upon him, commanding his attendants to throw him headlong from the Tarpeian rock. The officers took hold of the venerable magiſtrate by the throat, and threw him with the utmoſt barbarity. The inſolence of the tribune Labeo.

iv.

[k] Cic. de orat. l. i.

barbarity. One of his ſlaves flew to acquaint his maſter's relations with the violence offered him. They all came and found the cenſor half dead wallowing in his blood. As it was not lawful to take even a relation, no not a father, out of the hands of a tribune, they flew with all poſſible ſpeed, and brought one of Labeo's collegues, who oppoſed the unjuſt ſentence, and ſaved the remains of Metellus's life. Without this timely aſſiſtance, the moſt conſiderable magiſtrate in Rome after the conſul, the triumphant victor and conqueror of Macedon, whence he had the glorious ſurname of Macedonicus, would have been executed like a common criminal. Labeo was ſo far from being puniſhed for this cruél inſult on Metellus, that he had intereſt enough to get a law paſſed, enacting, that for the future the tribunes ſhould all have votes in the ſenate. This law being paſſed, he went in ſtate to the forum, and there by ſound of trumpet ordered all the effects of the great Macedonicus to be ſold to the beſt bidder. Such acts of violence were to all diſcerning men the forerunners of thoſe civil wars which not long after broke out [1].

In the next conſulate of C. Sempronius Tuditanus and M. Aquilius, freſh troubles were raiſed on account of the Sempronian law. The commiſſioners for putting it in execution, were continually ſtirring up the people againſt the rich by their complaints; and the allies of the republic complained as much of the injuſtice of the commiſſioners, who in the diſtribution of the lands were more favourable to the inhabitants of Rome, whoſe votes might be of ſervice to them, than the people of the provinces. Scipio therefore took the latter under his protection, and having ſpoke warmly in favour of thoſe poor allies, got the execution of the law transferred from the three commiſſioners to the conſul Sempronius. But the conſul, dreading the conſequences of civil broils at home, as much as he loved the glory of arms abroad, ſet out for Japidia, one of the weſtern provinces of Illyricum, which had fallen to him by lot, to quell ſome diſturbances lately raiſed there. Scipio, thus left alone to ſtand the hatred of the three commiſſioners, for the other conſul was then ſettling the kingdom of Pergamus in peace, was charged by them with the moſt odious deſign [illegible] That indeed of aſpiring to the dictatorſhip was probab[illegible]ue; but it was no matter of juſt reproach to him, th[illegible] he was greatly calumniated for it by the commiſſioners, [illegible]ian.

[illegible]om

[1] Gell. l. xiv. c. 8. Cic. pro domo ſua.

miſſioners, and their adherents. C. Gracchus his brother-in-law told him to his face, That he ought to be put to death as a tyrant. Scipio calmly replied; There is ſcarce any man, who is not an enemy to his country, that deſires it. Marcus Fulvius Flaccus, one of the triumvirs, caſt the moſt bitter reflections rage could ſuggeſt upon Scipio, cenſured both his public and private conduct, and warmly inſiſted, that the dictatorſhip was his point in view, and that he deſired this dignity only in order to uſurp a perpetual tyranny. But nevertheleſs, both the ſenate and people ſeemed inclined to favour Scipio's motion, the partiality of the triumvirs in the diſtribution of the lands being very palpable. All the ſenators in a body, and vaſt crouds both of Roman citizens and allies, attended him to his houſe. In ſhort, Rome ſeemed to nominate him dictator the next day. But in the morning, to the great grief and ſurpriſe of all well-wiſhers to their country, he was found dead in his bed. Thoſe who viewed his body more narrowly, diſcovered the marks of a violent death about his neck, as if he had been ſtrangled. His death was, upon good grounds, imputed to the triumvirs, Papirius Carbo, C. Gracchus, and Fulvius Flaccus, and to his wife Sempronia, the ſiſter of the Gracchi, who is ſaid to have conveyed in the night the triumvirs into his room. The authors of the crime took great pains to ſpread a report, that Scipio, finding he could not obtain for the allies the advantages he had promiſed them, had out of grief and deſpair laid violent hands on himſelf. Thus died this illuſtrious hero, whoſe talents and exploits were ſo equal to thoſe of the firſt Africanus, that Rome herſelf could not determine which was ſuperior in merit. Their characters, their conduct, their tempers, and their honours, were equally great; and, to the eternal reproach of their country, one died with grief in a kind of exile, and the other a violent death in Rome. The ſecond Africanus died poſſeſſed of very little elſe but the glory of his exploits. For he left to Quintus Fabius Maximus, his nephew and heir, having no children himſelf, ſcarce thirty-two pounds weight of ſilver, and two pounds and a half of gold. Surpriſing poverty in a general, who might have enriched himſelf with the ſpoils of Carthage! The patricians wept for him as a father. When Metellus [illegible]o had been all his life-time his rival for glory, heard [illegible]ews of his death, he ſhewed the utmoſt concern, an[illegible]ning to his two ſons, Go, ſaid he, attend [illegible] funeral of [illegible] greateſt man Rome ever bred; you will n[illegible]ver ſee his e[illegible]l. The people people too lamented his death, and attended in great crouds his body to the funeral pile; but they would not ſuffer any enquiries to be made after the authors of his death, for fear of finding C. Gracchus, who now began to be their darling, concerned in ſo baſe and treacherous a murder [m].

The death of Scipio.

His character.

WHILE theſe things were tranſacting at Rome, the conſul Tuditanus was making war in Japidia, where he was attended with ſuch ſucceſs, that in one campaign he quieted the whole country, and upon his return to Rome was honoured with a triumph, as was likewiſe his collegue Aquilius three years after for reducing the kingdom of Pergamus, though he did it by poiſoning the ſprings, which ſupplied the ſeveral towns with water; which was a moſt execrable and inhuman breach of the law of nations. And now there was not the leaſt diſturbance or commotion in any of the provinces ſubject to the Roman republic. Ciſalpine Gaul, Spain, Africa, Iſtria, Illyricum, Macedon, and Greece, bore the yoke with great ſubmiſſion; ſo that there was no expedition for the new conſuls, Cn. Octavius and T. Annius, to undertake within or without Italy. The people gave themſelves wholly up to pleaſures and luxury in this time of tranquillity; which licentiouſneſs greatly encreaſed in the ſucceeding conſulate of L. Caſſius Longinus and L. Cornelius Cinna. But when M. Æmilius Lepidus and L. Aurelius Oreſtes were raiſed to the conſular dignity, this general tranquillity was a little interrupted by a revolt in Sardinia, which province fell to the lot of Aurelius; and Caius Gracchus was his quæſtor.

Caius Gracchus.

This young Roman was become the idol of the people, who after the death of his brother looked upon him as their chief patron and protector. He had indeed ſome very eminent qualities, and was deemed the beſt orator in Rome. The multitude adored him on account of his favouring the citizens of Rome, more than the allies, in the partition of lands. He had for ſome time retired from public life, and applied himſelf wholly to the ſtudy of eloquence. During his retirement, the republic enjoyed a profound tranquillity; and it was commonly ſaid, that he had reſolved to bury his talents in obſcurity for fear of his brother's [illegible]ate. But after two years retirement, he unexpectedly [illegible]eared upon the ſtage, and ſtood for the quæſtorſhip, ſhip, which he obtained, and in that quality attended the conſul Aurelius into Sardinia, where he ſignalized his courage, and obliged all who depended upon him in the diſcharge of his office. He gained the affection of his general by his punctuality, ready obedience, and the great ſervices he rendered him in ſupplying the army with cloaths and proviſions by the intereſt he had among the Sardinians, who were greatly taken with his temperance, modeſty, and obliging carriage. But the ſenate, in the mean time, growing jealous of the popularity Gracchus acquired in the army, and dreading the conſequences of it, ordered all the troops in Sardinia to be recalled, and freſh ones to be ſent in their room. The next year the patricians had the mortification to ſee Fulvius Flaccus, who had had been one of the triumvirs for the partition of the lands, raiſed to the conſulate. His collegue was Plautius Hypſæus, a patrician of a mild and pacific diſpoſition. The plebeian conſul was no ſooner entered upon his office, than he propoſed a law, enacting, that the right of Roman citizenſhip ſhould be granted to all the Italian allies, to whom the triumvirs had not been able to aſſign any ſhare in the divided lands. He had, when one of the triumvirs, exaſperated the people in the provinces, by not admitting them to an equal ſhare of lands with the inhabitants of Rome; and now by this law he endeavoured to reconcile himſelf to them. He ſupported it with a fury, which ſhewed him determined to exaſperate the ſenate. The patricians earneſtly entreated him to drop the law, which would not fail to be attended with dangerous conſequences, and might kindle a war in the bowels of Italy. But the imperious conſul did not even vouchſafe to give them an anſwer, ſo that there was reaſon to fear an immediate rupture: but a new incident intervened, which kept the republic for ſome time in tranquillity. Embaſſadors came from Maſſilia, deſiring the aſſiſtance of the Romans againſt the Salyes, who had ravaged their country. This gave the ſenate an opportunity of ſending Fulvius beyond the Alps; and he, being greedy of glory, readily accepted the commiſſion. His abſence, and that of Gracchus, might have given the republic an interval of reſt, if the ſeditious conſul had not, before he left Rome, ſown the ſeeds of a rebellion, which broke out as ſoon as he was gone. For the Italian allies having by his departure loſt all hopes of obtaining the right of citizenſhip, with which he had flattered them, began to enter into cabals againſt the republic. Fregellæ, a city of the Volſci

[m] App[illegible] de bell. civil. l. 1. Cic. in Lælio, & pro Muræna. Plut. in R[illegible]ul. & Gracch. Diodor. Sicul. in excerpt.

He gains the affection of the ſoldiery.

Fregellæ razed.

on

on the Liris, was the firſt that openly revolted. But Numitorius Pullus, the chief author of the rebellion, being cited before the prætor, and frightened into a diſcovery of the whole plot, a Roman army was ſent againſt the city, which by the advice of Numitorius ſubmitted; but nevertheleſs was immediately razed. Numitorius himſelf was pardoned, but all his accomplices condemned to die, and executed. The exemplary puniſhment of the Fregellani checked the boldneſs of the malecontents, and ſtifled the ſedition for ſome time [n].

ALL ſeemed quiet, when C. Caſſius Longinus and C. Sextius Calvinus were raiſed to the conſulate; but this calm was of ſhort duration. C. Gracchus, who had been continued, much againſt his inclination, in Sardinia, with the character of pro-quæſtor, being weary of his long ſtay in an iſland where his talents were buried, and fearing the affections of the people might cool by ſo long an abſence, reſolved to run all the hazards of a very bold ſtep. In open defiance to all law, he embarqued unknown to the conſul, left Sardinia, and, when leaſt expected, appeared at Rome. He was therefore accuſed before the cenſors, but ſo far impoſed upon his judges by his eloquence, that he was acquitted. The high eſteem and great concern which the multitude ſhewed for him on this occaſion, encouraged him to ſtand for the tribuneſhip. He flattered himſelf, that if he could once get poſſeſſion of this important office, he ſhould eaſily find means to maintain himſelf in it, and to execute all his ſchemes of revenge at leiſure. He therefore put himſelf among the candidates, and ſolicited the office with the utmoſt diligence and application. This rouſed the ſenate to be more active in oppoſing him; and his excellent mother Cornelia was very preſſing with him to deſiſt. She wrote to him from one of her country-houſes in Campania near cape Miſenum, whither ſhe had retired after the melancholy death of her eldeſt ſon, two very affectionate letters upon this ſubject (X); in which ſhe

C. Gracchus returns from Sardinia.

[n] Liv. epit. Appian. l. i. de bell. civil. Val. Max. l. ix. c. 5. Jul. Obſeq. Cic. de inven. l. ii. de finib. l. ii. in Piſon. & ad Heren l. iv.

(X) [illegible] theſe letters have reached our times, and ſufficiently ſhew [illegible] ſpirit and ſentiments of that heroine, in whoſe [illegible]raiſes the [illegible]ients often ex[illegible]iate. In one of them ſhe expreſſes herſelf thu[illegible] "Son, you [illegible]ve now no partner in the affection "of the labours to divert him from his design with such tenderness both for him and her country, as shews her worthy of the

" of your mother. Tiberius is no more. All my joys and fears " centre wholly in you. The death of your elder brother was " owing to his desire of revenge ; and will you suffer yourself to " be hurried on to your destruction by the impetuosity of the " same passion ? Avert, ye gods, so fatal a presage ; It will be " a satisfaction, you will say, to revenge his murder. I allow " it, dear child. I have as strong a sense as you, of the pleasure " of revenge. But I can, by force of reason, suppress the first " sallies which passion raises in my breast. And at present, my " concern for the welfare of the public has a greater influence up- " on me, than my grief at the loss of my son. Ah, Gracchus ! " remember, that with the same blow which wounds your coun- " try, you will strike deep into your mother's breast. But what " am I saying ! You will yourself sink under the weight of this " rash attempt. I shall lose you ; but your enemies will remain. " Unfortunate mother ! let what will happen, the ill effects of " the civil broils, in which you are preparing to engage, will " fall upon me, and be more than I shall be able to bear (32) ".

Gracchus paid no regard to the representations of his mother, his rage against the senate getting the better of her wholesome advice. This drew from her a second letter in the following words : " Undutiful child ! next to the murderers of Tiberius, I have " not a more cruel enemy in the world than you. Have I had " any reason to expect, that my only surviving son should bring " me nothing but bitterness in my old age ? To what can I im- " pute this disobedience, but to my continual indulgence, and too " great compliance with your inclinations ? And is it too much to " desire an equal return of deference and respect ? Impious " wretch ! will you never be at rest till you have destroyed the " republic ? Shall I have the mortification before I die, to see " that you have overturned it ? Do not, Gracchus, do not act " over again the tragical scenes of my unfortunate family ! Wait " at least till my eyes are closed, before you stand for the tri- " buneship ; and then my ashes will not feel the misfortunes " which you will bring upon yourself. In the midst of your di- " stress you will perhaps invoke the manes of your father and mo- " ther : but will they then be affected with your tears ? The " time to believe and obey them, is while they live. O great " Jupiter ! suffer not my son to persist in a design, w[illegible] must " be the destruction of himself, his country, and his m[illegible] 3)".

From these small remains we may judge whether thi[illegible] f citi parable ter f th ollegis.

(32) Ex frag. Cornel. Nepotis a[illegible]ell Andrea Su[illegible] (33) Idem ibid.

the ſtatue which the ſenate permitted the people to erect to her memory. But neither her entreaties nor commands could prevail; he purſued his point, and ſucceeded. There was this circumſtance peculiar to his election, that for want of room in the campus Martius, a great number of citizens got up on the roofs of the houſes round it, and from thence voted for Gracchus with ſhouts and acclamations. His graceful perſon, noble air, fine features, and modeſt deportment, poſſeſſed every ſpectator in his favour before he ſpoke; and when he did ſpeak, their ears were no leſs charmed; for a more complete orator had never aſcended the roſtra ° (Y). Soon after the election of Gracchus to the tribuneſhip, his fellow triumvir Fulvius Flaccus returned from Gaul to ſecond him in his attempts. He was a furious plebeian, and a declared enemy to the ſenate and the rich, and ready to embarque in any bold and deſperate undertaking. Gracchus procured him a triumph for an expedition of little importance, in order to bring new honour and ſtrength to his party by the addition of a conſular man, and a triumphant victor [P].

Is choſen tribune.

THUS

° Cic. l. ii. de orat. [P] Plut. in Gracch. Appian. ibid.

ble matron could have any hand in the baſe aſſaſſination of the ſecond Africanus, which ſome writers have, without any grounds, laid to her charge. She loved her children, but had at the ſame time a tender regard for her country; and therefore the ſenate, notwithſtanding their reſentment againſt her two ſons, ſuffered the people to erect a ſtatue to her with this inſcription on the baſe; To Cornelia the mother of the Gracchi.

(Y) Cicero, a good judge in point of oratory, tells us, that a more complete orator than Caius Gracchus never appeared in the roſtra. His graceful perſon, noble air, fine features, and expreſſive action, charmed all who ſaw or heard him. His voice, which was ſtrong and melodious, reached and affected the moſt diſtant auditors. The only fault imputed to him was too much vehemence, when he ſuffered paſſion to tranſport him. The orator, who was himſelf well appriſed of this defect, choſe out from among his ſlaves an excellent muſician, whom he kept conſtantly behind him, when he was ſpeaking. If in a fit of paſſion the orato[r] h[e] opened to raiſe his voice too much, the ſlave with a ſort of f[lute] ſet brought him back to his proper key. So much care did the Romans take, when they ſpoke in public, to give their ſpeech all poſſible graces. But Gracchus never appeared more

THUS all things ſeemed to tend to a ſedition in Rome, when Q. Cæcilius Metellus and T. Quinctius Flaminius were choſen conſuls. The former was ſent into the Balearic iſlands to quell an inſurrection there, and the latter continued at Rome, where Gracchus was daily inventing new ſchemes to depreſs the ſenate, and exalt the people. He got his brother's law confirmed, relating to the diviſion of the lands of Italy between the citizens of Rome and the indigent allies; and for the more ſpeedy execution of it, he cauſed himſelf to be nominated one of the commiſſioners for the ſaid partition, in conjunction with Fulvius Flaccus, and Licinius Craſſus, who ſeems to have been the brother of his wife Licinia. With the aſſiſtance of theſe he undertook and performed ſeveral works in favour of the people. For the convenience of travellers, he repaired the great roads, built a great many bridges, erected the firſt milliary columns, or columns at the end of each mile, and placed ſtones at proper diſtances for the eaſe of travellers in mounting their horſes. Theſe public works gained him the hearts of the people; but the two following laws which he got paſſed in ſpite of the ſenate, were far more agreeable to the multitude than any public works. The firſt was, that public granaries ſhould be built at Rome, and filled with corn at the public expence; the ſecond, that monthly diſtributions ſhould be made from thence to every citizen who wanted corn, at a very low price. In order to enable the treaſury to bear this expence, he got duties laid on all the goods imported into Aſia at the ports deviſed to the republic by king Attalus. He paſſed ſeveral other laws relating to the ſervice and cloathing of the troops, which were ſo agreeable to the people, that the tribune gained an abſolute aſcendant over them, and became in a manner deſpotic maſter of Rome. This could not but raiſe the hatred and jealouſy of the patricians, who united all their intereſt to cruſh him as ſoon as his office ſhould expire. To prevent this, Flaccus preſſed him to ſolicit the tribuneſhip a ſecond time; which more eloquent, than when he lamented the tragical end of his brother. As he was affected with it himſelf, his deſcriptions were ſo ſtrong and lively, that they drew tears from every eye (34).

His new laws.

He is choſen tribune a ſecond time.

(34) Cic. de orat. l. iii.

which he did accordingly, and ſucceeded, in ſpite of the utmoſt efforts of the ſenate, and the whole body of the nobility [q].

The Balearic iſlands ſubdued.

WHILE Gracchus was thus humbling the ſenate, the conſul Metellus, landing in the Balearic iſlands, ſubdued them, and treated thoſe poor helpleſs barbarians with ſuch cruelty, that, out of thirty thouſand, he ſcarce left one thouſand of them alive. After this bloody and eaſy victory, the conſul built two cities in the larger iſland, one to the eaſt, called Palma, now Majorca; the other to the weſt, named Pollentia, now no longer in being. To people theſe two places, the conſul brought three thouſand Romans from the colonies on the continent of Spain. After this the conſul returned to Rome, where he triumphed, and was honoured with the ſurname of Baleáricus, as his father had been with that of Macedonicus. At the ſame time the proconſul Sextius, who had been continued in Tranſalpine Gaul, having gained a complete victory over the Salyes, found no difficulty in ſubduing the whole nation. He beſieged their capital, which ſtood at a ſmall diſtance from Maſſilia or Marſeilles, took it, and reduced the inhabitants to ſlavery. When the conquered came to be ſold, the proconſul, being informed that one of them, by name Crato, had ſuffered much from his countrymen on account of his affection to the Romans, not only gave him his liberty, and reſtored to him all his effects; but allowed him to chuſe out nine hundred among his countrymen, who were, at his requeſt, ſet at liberty [r]. After this the proconſul, to ſecure his new conqueſt, founded a colony in the place where he had gained his victory, chuſing a ſpot of ground for this purpoſe, which abounded both with hot and cold ſprings. Here he built a new city, which, from the ſprings and his own name, he called Aquæ Sextiæ. This place, now known by the name of Aix in Provence, he peopled with a colony, which Rome had formerly planted at Fabrateria, in the country of the Volſci. Sextius, having thus ſettled the Romans in Tranſalpine Gaul, returned to Rome, and triumphed; an honour which he better deſerved than his predeceſſor Fulvius Flaccus had done [s].

And the Salyes in Tranſalpine Gaul.

Aquæ Sextiæ or Aix founded.

THE

[q] Plut. in Gracch. Salluſt. in frag. [r] Ammian. Marcel. l. xv. Vel. Paterc. l. i. c. 15. Diodor. Sicul. in excerpt. Valeſ.
[s] Strabo, l. iv. Vel. Paterc. l. i. Flor. l. iii. c. 2.

THE conſul, on his return to Rome, found the republic in great confuſion on account of the innovations of Gracchus. The ſeditious tribune ſaw with concern, that the Roman knights, who were the moſt wealthy of the citizens, inclined more to the ſide of the nobility, than to his; ſo that the plebeian party was made up only of the indigent populace. The knights were indeed reckoned a part of the plebeian body; but, as they were the richeſt of that order, they made alliances with the patricians, and, upon a diviſion, generally ſided with them. Gracchus therefore, in order to draw them off from the ſenate, and bring them into his meaſures, drew up a law for making ſix hundred of them ſenators; but this law the crafty tribune propoſed only to pave the way for another, which was in appearance more moderate, but in effect raiſed the knights above the ſenators. This was, to transfer from the ſenators to the knights the cognizance of all private cauſes, civil and criminal. The ſenators uſed their utmoſt efforts to get this law rejected; but Gracchus was abſolute maſter of the ſuffrages of the people, ſo that the following plebiſcitum paſſed by a vaſt majority, Let the judging of all private cauſes belong to the knights, excluſive of the ſenators. The tribune was ſo elated with this ſucceſs, that he cried out in a tranſport of joy, I have at length humbled the ſenate. The favour which the people ſhewed him on this occaſion, emboldened him to proceed ſo far, as to ſolicit for the conſulſhip, in ſuch terms as led the people to conclude, that he intended to appear for it himſelf; but when the day of the elections came, he entered the campus Martius, leading his friend C. Fannius Strabo by the hand, whom he recommended to the favour of the people, ſaying, with a very engaging air, which he knew how to aſſume when he pleaſed, If you confer the conſulſhip on my friend, it is the ſame thing as if you conferred it upon me. This was enough, Fannius was declared conſul with Cneius Domitius Ahenobarbus. It fell to the lot of the latter to carry on the war beyond the Alps, and to the former to continue in Italy. And now Gracchus, being raiſed to ſuch a pitch of power and authority over the people of Rome, as the moſt abſolute monarchs have over their ſubjects, in order to ſhew his contempt for the ſenate, cauſed the ſeats in the comitium to be changed. The plebeians had hitherto been ſo placed, that the orators, who harangued them, at the ſame time faced the ſenate, and addreſſed themſelves

The knights made judges in all private cauſes.

ſelves to that venerable body as well as to the people; but Gracchus, by altering the ſituation of the plebeians, contrived it ſo, that, when he harangued the people, he turned his back to the ſenators. This was a glaring proof, that he acknowledged no ariſtocratical power in the republic, but thought the whole authority lodged ſolely in the people. This laſt outrage rouſed the ſenators, and put them upon contriving expedients to check the inſolence of the daring tribune. As the conſul Domitius was abſent, Gracchus is oppoſed by the conſul C. Fannius.

they applied themſelves to his collegue C. Fannius, whom, to their great joy and ſurprize, they found to be in his heart a ſteady republican, and a ſincere friend to his country, not to be corrupted, and determined not to ſacrifice the intereſt of the public to his private gratitude. Soon after his election, the popular tribune revived a prohibition formerly given to the judges, not to put in execution a capital ſentence on a Roman citizen, without the conſent and order of the people. This law met with no oppoſition; but when he propoſed the following edict, That the allies ſhould be upon the ſame foot with the citizens of Rome as to a right of ſuffrage, even in the acceptance or refuſal of laws, the conſul Fannius, thinking this a monſtrous innovation, to the great ſurprize of his benefactor, openly declared againſt him, and, mounting the roſtra, harangued the people with great zeal, expatiating on the evil conſequences that would infallibly attend the paſſing of the law propoſed by the tribune. By this means the republic was divided between her two chief magiſtrates, and the debates grew every day warmer and warmer. One was ſupported by the ſenate, the other by the multitude, and both carried matters to great extremities. Gracchus was for giving the right of citizenſhip and ſuffrage to all the Italian allies of Rome, from the moſt eaſtern parts of Italy to the foot of the Alps, which drew vaſt crouds of thoſe people to the capital. The ſenate, alarmed at this prodigious concourſe of ſtrangers, engaged the conſul to forbid all thoſe, who had not yet a right of ſuffrage, to continue in the city, or within five miles of it. This order gave riſe to a warm diſpute between the conſul and the tribune in point of juriſdiction. Fannius inſiſted, that theſe new-comers ſhould leave Rome; Gracchus encouraged them not to obey an order, which the conſul had no right to publiſh. On one ſide were enacted conſular edicts; and on the other ordinances of the tribune directly contrary to them. At length the boldeſt man ſucceeded; Fannius, who was a better ſoldier than orator, thinking ing it neceſſary to make uſe of force, ſent his lictors to ſeize ſome of thoſe pretenders to the citizenſhip of Rome, and cauſed them to be dragged through the ſtreets, and driven out of the city. Gracchus, either out of cowardice, or, as he ſaid, for fear of giving riſe to a civil war, ſuffered his friends to be thus treated, without offering to aſſiſt them; and this too great tameneſs was the firſt thing that leſſened his credit, and made his partizans ſomewhat diffident [t].

But it was not enough for the ſenate to have thus checked the exorbitant power of the tribune; they aimed at nothing leſs than his deſtruction: but as they could not compaſs their deſign, without gaining over one of his brother tribunes, they applied themſelves to Livius Druſus, judging him the moſt proper perſon in the college for their purpoſe. He was in the flower of his age, of an illuſtrious family, though plebeian, in point of manners blameleſs, ſkilled in buſineſs, a good orator, and capable of a laudable emulation. As he had nothing more at heart than the welfare of his country, and the ſervice of his fellow-citizens, he came readily into the meaſures of the conſcript fathers; but they, remembering the misfortunes of Octavius, who had oppoſed the attempts of Tiberius, directed Livius to purſue quite different meaſures from thoſe which that tribune had taken, and taught him a conduct ſo refined and ſo well-judged, that hiſtorians commend it as a maſter-piece of policy. They did not deſire him to oppoſe the novelties which Gracchus daily introduced, but, on the contrary, to court the favour of the people, by attempting to ſurpaſs Gracchus himſelf in popularity; a ſcheme finely laid, and executed with ſtill more addreſs. If Gracchus propoſed any law agreeable to the people, and diſpleaſing to the ſenate, Livius immediately propoſed another which was more ſo, and by that means brought himſelf into great favour with the multitude. This game was ſo artfully played, as not to be ſuſpected even by the moſt ſagacious of the adverſe party. Gracchus could not ſee without concern the good-will of the people divided between him and Livius; and being ſenſible that his intereſt was daily leſſened among the multitude, he began to ſhew ſome reſpect to the fathers, who returned it with great civilities, and pretended to be upon very good terms with him. But their maſter-piece was yet behind: they prevailed

The ſenate gains over Livius, one of the tribunes.

The artifice of the ſenate.

[t] Plut. & Appian. ibid.

vailed on Rubrius, another tribune, to propoſe a law for raiſing ſix thouſand Romans to rebuild and repeople Carthage. The law being paſſed, Rubrius, under pretence of doing honour to Gracchus, named him in the firſt place to be the leader of the colony, his ſeditious friend Fulvius Flaccus in the ſecond place, and himſelf in the third. Gracchus fell into the ſnare, and croſſing the ſea, ſpent ſome months in Africa, and began to build there a new city on the ruins of Carthage, which he called Junonia, from the name of the goddeſs, who had always been the protectreſs of the old city. At the end of two months, Gracchus returned to Rome, where he met with a very indifferent reception, even from the moſt zealous of his party. Livius, during his abſence, had got the aſcendant, and gained the affections of the people to ſuch a degree, that Gracchus was now almoſt quite forgot by the unſteady multitude. The popular tribune was ſo ſenſible of this, that his friends had much ado to keep up his drooping ſpirits. However, he took ſome ſteps to prevail on the people to elect him tribune the third time, which was his laſt game; but at the ſame time he very imprudently affronted the reſt of his collegues, by ordering a ſcaffold to be pulled down, which they had erected to ſee more conveniently a ſhew of gladiators (Z). Gracchus pretended, that the ſcaffold

A decree paſſed for rebuilding Carthage.

Gracchus ſtands for the tribune ſhip a third time.

(Z) The combats of gladiators paſſed from Greece, or, as others will have it, from the Aſiatic provinces, to Hetruria, and from thence to Rome. This cruel cuſtom was firſt introduced into the world to ſupply the room of human victims, which the pagans offered at the funeral piles, or near the tombs of their anceſtors, from a ſuperſtitious notion, that the ſouls or manes of the deceaſed were rendered propitious and highly pleaſed with human blood. This monſtrous perſuaſion prevailed even among the more civilized nations. They generally believed, that the effuſion of human blood was a tribute which the dead required of the living; but, to diſguiſe their impious barbarity with the ſpecious ſhew of pleaſure and voluntary combat, they introduced gladiators, that is, men deſtined by the ſtate to cut one another's throats. Theſe combats were, in their firſt riſe, confined to the funerals of great men; but in a ſhort time became common at the obſequies of private perſons. Thoſe who could afford it, never failed to allot in their wills a certain ſum for a combat of gladiators, this being a ſure way of drawing a great concourſe of people together, and having their obſequies performed with great ſolemnity. The firſt ſhew of gladiators, called by the Latins munus gladiatorum, was exhibited at Rome ſcaffold raiſed by the tribunes left no room for the common people to ſee the ſhew. By this bold action he ingratiated

 himſelf

Rome, according to Valerius Maximus (35), by M. and D. Brutus upon the death of their father, in the year of the city 490. Several years after, that is, in the year of Rome 537, upon the death of Marcus Æmilius Lepidus the augur, who had been thrice honoured with the conſulate, his three ſons, Lucius, Marcus, and Quintus, entertained the people with the cruel pleaſure of ſeeing twenty-two couple of gladiators fight in the forum. In the year of Rome 547, the firſt Africanus diverted his army at new Carthage with a ſhew of gladiators, which he exhibited in honour of his father and uncle, who had begun the reduction of Spain. On this occaſion two young Spaniards, of an illuſtrious birth and couſin-germans, who contended for the ſovereignty of a city named Lacibis, obtained leave of Scipio to end their quarrel by ſingle combat; which they did accordingly, and their example was followed by ſeveral other Spaniards of diſtinction, who fought either to end their perſonal quarrels by duels, or purely to gain ſome glory by conquering. In proceſs of time the Romans grew ſo fond of theſe bloody entertainments, that not only the heir of any great and rich citizen lately deceaſed, but all the principal magiſtrates, preſented the people with ſhews of this nature, to procure their eſteem and affection. The ædiles, pretors, conſuls, and, above all, the candidates for offices, made their court to the people, by entertaining them frequently with theſe fights. As for the emperors, it was ſo much their intereſt to ingratiate themſelves with the populace, that they obliged them with combats of gladiators almoſt upon all occaſions. As theſe bloody ſolemnities were encreaſed, ſo was the number of the combatants. At the firſt ſhew exhibited by the Bruti, only three couple of gladiators fought; but Julius Cæſar, in his ædileſhip, diverted the people with three hundred and twenty couple (36). Titus exhibited a ſhew of gladiators, wild beaſts, and repreſentations of ſea-fights, which laſted an hundred days; and Trajan continued a ſolemnity of this nature an hundred and twenty-three days, during which time he brought out a thouſand couple of gladiators. The number of gladiators were ſo great, even in the time of the republic, that when the conſpiracy of Cataline broke out, the ſenate ordered them to be diſperſed about the ſtrong-holds, and ſecured, leſt they ſhould join in the diſaffected party. The famous Spartacus, who put Rome under no ſmall apprehenſion, was himſelf a gladiator, and of the ſame condition were the greater part of his troops, with which he defeated the two Roman generals Claudius and Vatinius. As to the condition of the gladiators, they were commonly (35) Val. Max. l. ii. c. 6. (36) Dio Caſſ. l. lxviii.

himſelf with the mob, but provoked the whole college of the tribunes, who ſoon found an opportunity to ſhew their reſent-ly ſlaves, or captives purchaſed by the laniſtæ, that is, by perſons who made it their profeſſion to teach them how to manage their arms, and brought them up for public ſhews. The laniſtæ hired them out at a great price to the perſon who was at the expence of the ſhew, and led them, armed to the amphitheatre, like ſo many victims. Before they entered the liſts, their maſters, or the laniſtæ, engaged them by the moſt dreadful oaths, never to give ground, but to fight to the laſt extremity. The form of this oath is ſtill preſerved in the fragments of Petronius. When brought to the place ſet apart for theſe bloody ſhews, they were ranged into claſſes, and divided into couples; ſo that each had his adverſary. They fought with the utmoſt fury, and purſued one another without mercy, their maſters ſparing neither threatenings nor blows to ſtir up the cowardly. If either of the two combatants, exhauſted with fatigue and loſs of blood, or ſtruck with horror at the approach of death, begged quarter, he held up his finger, and laid down his arms, to ſhew that he had recourſe to the mercy of the people preſent, from whom he expected the deciſion of his fate. It often happened, that the ſpectators took a cruel pleaſure in giving up the ſuppliant to the fury of his adverſary; and then, Recipe ferrum, Stab him, ſtab him, was the cry from all parts of the theatre. Sometimes the multitude declared their pleaſure, by holding up, or, as others will have it, by bending back their thumbs, which was the fatal ſign of condemnation. The cowardly ſcarce ever met with any favour from the populace, who were deaf to their cries and prayers. On the other hand, thoſe who ſhewed a generous contempt of death, were generally favoured by the people, and ſaved.

As ſoon as the mournful ſound of the trumpets proclaimed the death of one of the gladiators, his body, covered with wounds and blood, was ignominiouſly dragged with a crook, through one of the gates of the amphitheatre to a place adjoining, called Spoliarium, where the conquerors ſtripped the dead of their cloaths and arms, and inhumanly diſpatched them, if they ſtill breathed. Pliny tells us (37), that many of the common people often crouded round the dying, and clapping their mouths, without the leaſt concern, to their trembling limbs, drank their warm blood, as it ſtreamed from their wounds, out of a perſuaſion, that it was a ſovereign remedy for the falling-ſickneſs. If the people ſhewed an inclination to favour the vanquiſhed, the laniſta ſtill retained his right to them, and kept them for other combats. The reward

(37) Plin. l. xxviii.

reſentment; for a few days after, when the election came on, the old tribunes, whoſe buſineſs it was to collect the votes, ward of the conqueror was only a crown of maſtic and a palm branch which he received from the hands of the magiſtrates, to which was added ſometimes, but very rarely, a ſmall ſum of money.

The greateſt of all the advantages the gladiators ever gained in their victories, and after many years of ſervice, was, the recovery of their liberty. In this caſe, the prætor declared them for ever free from the hard fate of being ſubjected to an avaricious and mercileſs maſter. A kind of foyl, called by the Latins rudis, was put into their hands, as a pledge of their enfranchiſment, and on their heads a ſort of bonnet, named pileus, which was given to all thoſe, who from ſlaves became free. When they were thus ſet at liberty, they conſecrated their arms to Hercules, the tutelary god of the gymnaſia, or military ſchools.

The gladiators were, as we have hinted above, commonly priſoners taken in war, or refractory and ungovernable ſlaves; for it was a common cuſtom for maſters to ſell ſuch ſervants to the laniſtæ, or the inſtructors of the gladiators: but, in proceſs of time, free men often fought for hire as gladiators; whence they had the name of auctorati. Some young perſons, of good families, after they had ſpent their eſtates in debauchery, were not aſhamed to hire themſelves out as gladiators; nay, the knights and noblemen, and even the ſenators themſelves, often took up this infamous profeſſion, to keep themſelves from ſtarving, after they had ſquandered away their patrimony; inſomuch, that Auguſtus was obliged to publiſh an edict, forbidding any of the ſenatorial order to turn gladiators. Not long after, he laid the ſame reſtraint on the knights (38). But theſe prohibitions were ſo little regarded by the following princes, that, in one ſhew exhibited by Nero, four hundred ſenators, if the numbers in Suetonius are not corrupted, and ſix hundred of the equeſtrian order, fought in the arena as common gladiators (39). Nay, even women of diſtinction frequently engaged in theſe public encounters, particularly under Nero, and Domitian, and are upon that account elegantly expoſed by Juvenal in the following verſes:

Quale decus rerum, ſi conjugis auctio fiat,
Balteus, & manicæ, & criſtæ, cruriſque ſiniſtri
Dimidium tegmen? vel ſi diverſa movebit
Prælia, tu felix, ocreas vendente puella.

(38) Dio Caſſ. l. xlviii. & Suet. in Auguſt. c. 43. (39) Suet. in Ner. c. 11.

Hæ

But is diſappointed.

votes, ſo counted them, that the majority was declared to be againſt Gracchus, tho', in all likelihood, the greateſt number

Hæ ſunt quæ tenui ſudant in cyclade, quarum
Delicias & panniculus bombycinus urit.
Aſpice quo fremitu monſtratos perferat ictus;
Et quanto galeæ curvetur pondere; quanta
Poplitibus ſedeat, quam denſo faſcia libro (40)!

Thus engliſhed by Mr. Dryden.

Oh! what a decent ſight 'tis to behold
All the wife's magazine by auction ſold!
The belt, the creſted plume, the ſev'ral ſuits
Of armour, and the Spaniſh-leather boots!
Yet theſe are they that cannot bear the heat
Of figur'd ſilks, and under farſenet ſweat.
Behold the ſtrutting Amazonian whore,
She ſtands in guard, with her right-foot before,
Her coats tuck'd up, and all her motions juſt,
She ſtamps, and then cries, Hah! at every thruſt.

But the moſt ridiculous ſet of combatants were the dwarfs, who, encountering one another, or engaging with the women, afforded the people great diverſion. They are deſcribed with a great deal of humour by Statius (41), to whom we refer our readers.

There are ſeveral kinds of gladiators, diſtinguiſhed by different appellations, which they took from their country, their arms, their way of fighting, or from ſuch-like circumſtances. The moſt famous, and moſt frequently mentioned by the antients, are, the Retiarii, the Secutores, the Myrmillones, the Thracians, the Samnites, the Pinnirapi, the Eſſedarii, and the Andabatæ. The Retiarius was dreſſed in a ſhort coat, having a fuſcina or trident in his left-hand, and a net in his right, with which he endeavoured to entangle his adverſary, that he might the more eaſily diſpatch him with his trident. The Secutor, who was always matched with the Retiarius, was armed with a buckler and a helmet, on which was engraven a fiſh, in alluſion to the net. If the Retiarius failed in caſting the net, he fled round the place of combat, till he had got it ready for a ſecond throw. In the mean time, his antagoniſt purſued him to prevent his deſign; and from thence was called Secutor or Follower. In the ſeveral motions, which the Retiarius made while he was attempting to catch the head of his adverſary in his net, he repeated the following words, recorded number of ſuffrages was for him. To complete his misfortune, his profeſſed enemy, L. Opimius, was choſen conſul, with Q. Fabius Maximus Æmilianus, nephew to the ſecond corded by Feſtus: Non te peto, piſcem peto; quid me fugis, Galle? Why do you fly from me, Gaul? my aim is not at you, but at your fiſh. The Secutor's weapon was a falx ſupina, or kind of ſcymiter. Juvenal gives us a very particular account of this ſort of combat, in ſpeaking of a young nobleman, who ſcandalouſly took up the profeſſion of a Retiarius in the reign of Nero (42). The Myrmillo was, as is pretty plain from Juvenal, the ſame as the Secutor. However, Lipſius will have the Myrmillones to be a diſtinct order of gladiators, who fought completely armed. The Thracians uſed a ſica, or dagger, and a parma, or little round ſhield. Some writers think they were called Thracians, becauſe they were natives of Thrace; others pretend they were ſo named from their weapons, which were peculiar to the Thracians. As to the Samnite gladiators, Livy tells us, that the Campanians, bearing a great hatred to the Samnites, armed ſome of their gladiators after the faſhion of that country, and called them Samnites. Such was their original. What their arms were, he tells us in another place; they wore, ſays he, a ſhield, broad at the top to defend their breaſts, and narrow at the bottom, that it might be moved with greater eaſe; they wore a belt over their ſhoulders, a greave on their left-foot, and a creſted helmet on their heads. Hence it is plain, that the Amazonian combatant, deſcribed above by Juvenal, had aſſumed the armour and duty of a Samnite gladiator. The Pinnirapi, who always entered the liſts againſt the Samnites, were ſo called from the pinnæ or creſt, which adorned the Samnite's helmet. Theſe pinnæ they uſed to catch at, and carry them off in triumph, as marks of their victory; and hence the name of Pinnirapi, made up of the two Latin words pinnæ and rapere. The Eſſedarii engaged one another in chariots, called eſſeda. The Andabatæ fought on horſeback, armed with a helmet, which covered their face and even their eyes, ſo that they ſtruck at a venture; and hence Andabatarum more pugnare is, among the Latins, to fight blind-fold.

(40) Juv. ſat vi. ver. 254, & ſeq. (41) Stat. l. vi. ver. 57., & ſeq.

We ſhall take our leave of the gladiators, with an obſervation out of Petronius Arbiter, who tells us, that the combats of gladiators were introduced out of ſuperſtition, but maintained out of policy; a cruel policy indeed! but the republic found her account in it. The Roman youth, being accuſtomed to look on blood and ſlaughter as matter of diverſion, learned to deſpiſe death, which was become familiar to them, and to brave the greateſt dangers.

(42) Juv. ſat. viii. ver. 199.

ſecond Africanus. It fell to the lot of Fabius to make war in Gaul, where Domitius Ahenobarbus, who had continued there with the character of proconſul, had gained great advantages, which we ſhall take notice of hereafter. As for Opimius, he continued in Italy, and made it his buſineſs to humble in his turn the great adverſary of the ſenate, and his own perſonal enemy; for Gracchus had got him formerly excluded from the conſular dignity, becauſe he would not come into his meaſures. The idol of the people, being thus reduced to the condition of a private man, and conſequently expoſed to the perſecution of his enemies, had recourſe to the law for rebuilding Carthage, and, together with Fulvius Flaccus, his inſeparable friend, raiſed ſix thouſand men for that purpoſe. When they had made the neceſſary preparations for paſſing over into Africa, they were informed, that the law would be repealed. This news brought them back to Rome; for they were then buſied in getting together on the ſea-coaſt a ſufficient number of veſſels for the tranſporting of their men. Upon their arrival, they found, that the ſenate had given the tribune M. Minucius inſtructions for that purpoſe; and that his chief argument to the people was built on ſome pretended prodigies, which were ſaid to have happened at Carthage, when the workmen firſt began to mark out the circumference of the new city. To diſprove this pretence, Gracchus mounted the roſtra once more, but both ſpoke and acted like a madman. Among other things he ſaid, That, if the ſenate reported, that heaven obſtructed the rebuilding of Carthage by prodigies, the ſenate lyed. Gracchus, who was naturally of a mild diſpoſition, would never have carried things to this extremity, if he had not been led to it by the advice of his friend Fulvius, who, tho' advanced in years, ſtill retained all the fire of youth. On the day appointed for the comitia to meet about the confirming or repealing of the law, Fulvius, early in the morning, poſted ſome of his faction in the area of the capitol, where the aſſembly was to be held; and Gracchus, with a numerous guard, took poſſeſſion of one of the porticos of the temple of Jupiter Capitolinus, there to wait for the reſult of the comitia. In the mean time, the conſul Opimius, having offered a ſacrifice to Jupiter in his temple on the capitol, one of the conſul's lictors, by name Antillius, as he was bringing out the entrails of this victim, after they had been preſented on the altar, inſulted Gracchus and his friends, crying out, 'Take care, rioters; make way for the faithful ſervant of the the republic. Upon this one of Gracchus's domeſticks drew a dagger, and laid Antillius dead at his feet. This unhappy accident, together with a violent ſtorm, diſperſed the crowd, every one retiring in great conſternation to his own houſe. As the author of the murder was not known, the greater part imputed it to Gracchus himſelf, tho' no one, even of the adverſe party, was more affected with it than he; for he knew, that his enemies waited for an opportunity to lay on him the blame of a civil war, which they were reſolved to begin. He paſſed the night in great uneaſineſs, dreading the evil conſequences of that raſh action; but Fulvius, who, from his earlieſt years, had been bred up in a camp, behaved in a very different manner. He retired to his houſe attended with a ſtrong guard, and there made a great entertainment for his friends, drinking hard, and cauſing wine to be freely diſtributed among thoſe who attended him. He did not retire till it was very late, and then ſlept ſound, till the out-cries of his guard, and the noiſe that was heard in all the ſtreets of Rome, awaked him. The conſul Opimius had taken poſſeſſion of the capitol with his conſular troops before day, and thereby made himſelf maſter of a poſt which commanded the city. After this, he had aſſembled the ſenate at the break of day in the temple of Caſtor and Pollux, and cauſed the dead body of Antillius to be expoſed to public view, in order to ſtir up the multitude againſt Gracchus and his adherents. The ſenate in great haſte drew up a decree, impowering the conſul to do whatever he ſhould judge proper for the publick good; which was in effect creating him dictator. Hereupon Opimius, reſolving to repay his old enemy all the evils the republic and himſelf had ſuffered from him, ordered the Roman knights to take up arms, and each to bring with him two domeſtics well armed. On the other hand, Fulvius, upon the firſt notice of theſe extraordinary proceedings, ran like a madman about the ſtreets; and, having raiſed the mob, flew, with his two ſons and a confuſed multitude, to take poſſeſſion of mount Aventine; ſo that the two extremities of Rome to the eaſt and weſt were like two camps, whence two armies were ready to march againſt each other. Gracchus, foreſeeing that much blood would be ſhed in this quarrel, ſhewed a great reluctance to follow Fulvius to mount Aventine. However, he reſolved at length to go and join his friend; but left his houſe more like a magiſtrate, who was going to put an end to a civil conteſt, than a warrior, who was marching to battle. He neither changed the habit, which he uſually wore in the city, nor took any other arms than a dagger under his robe, to defend himſelf in caſe he was attacked. As he was juſt going out of his houſe, his wife, who tenderly loved both her huſband and her country, ran, all in tears, to ſtop him. She ſeized him by his robe, and holding in her arms his ſon, the only pledge of their mutual affections; Whither are you going, ſaid ſhe, ſo early? Can you be ignorant, that the murderers of your brother are preparing the ſame fate for you? You are going to put yourſelf at the head of a vile rabble, who will baſely abandon you at the ſight of the leaſt danger. If you have any affection either for me or your dear child, take care of a life which is to us ſo dear. She was going on, when Gracchus, pierced to the heart with grief, and not having power to anſwer her, broke away from between her arms; but ſhe holding him by the robe, followed him, till at length, borne down with the weight of her grief, ſhe fainted and fell down in the ſtreet, whence ſhe was carried to the houſe of Licinius Craſſus her brother, who had entirely devoted himſelf to Gracchus's party. Gracchus, at his arrival on mount Aventine, found there a confuſed multitude of people, no-ways in a condition to withſtand the conſular troops and the whole body of the nobility, who, with their clients and domeſtics, formed a very powerful party. He therefore ſummoned the chief men of his party to a council of war, when they unanimouſly reſolved to fortify the temple of Diana, to invite the ſlaves to join them, with a promiſe of granting them their liberty, and, laſtly, to offer a treaty before they began hoſtilities. Gracchus prevailed on Fulvius to ſend to the conſul his youngeſt ſon, a child ſcarce twelve years old, but of extraordinary beauty, and admired by all for his underſtanding, which was much above his years. When young Fulvius appeared before Opimius with a caduceus, the ſymbol of peace, in his hand, the conſul, in deriſion to the embaſſy, received the young embaſſador with great pomp and ceremony, and then ordered him to return to mount Aventine, and inform thoſe who had ſent him, that, if they would obtain peace, they muſt come themſelves, and ſubmit to the judgment of the ſenate. Take care, child, ſaid the conſul, after he had returned that anſwer, take care you don't appear here a ſecond time. Their ſending an ambaſſador of your age can be done only to inſult us. Hereupon young Fulvius withdrew, and, returning to mount Aventine, made his report.

A lictor killed in the capitol by one of Gracchus's domeſtics.

The conſul Opimius ſeizes the capitol.

And Fulvius mount Aventine.

Gracchus joins Fulvius.

The conſul Opimius rejects the terms of accommodation offered by Gracchus and Fulvius.

Then

Then Gracchus himſelf, to prevent the ſpilling of Roman blood, offered to come down from the hill in perſon, to hear the propoſals of the ſenate; but the multitude would not ſuffer him, fearing to be deprived of their leader. As no body elſe cared to charge themſelves with this commiſſion, Fulvius had the imprudence to ſend his ſon a ſecond time to the conſul, who, without ſo much as hearing him, tho' he appeared before him with a great air of modeſty, cried out in a violent rage, It is too much to inſult us in this manner. Let the child be carried to priſon, not ſo much to puniſh the ſon, as to chaſtiſe the inſolence of the father. The order was immediately put in execution, and no farther mention made of treaties. The conſul reſolved, without loſs of time to fall upon the rebels and force them from their poſt. Accordingly he marched down the capitol, and, arriving at the foot of mount Aventine, began the attack with the prudence of an experienced officer. Fulvius, whoſe bravery had been honoured with a triumph, made a vigorous reſiſtance. And now Romans engaged for the firſt time with Romans, and conſuls with conſuls, within the very walls of Rome. There had been, before this time, ſeveral frays; but this was a formal battle, both parties being commanded by generals of great experience. Opimius ordered a body of archers, armed with bows and arrows after the Cretan manner, to march up the hill, under the command of Decimus Brutus, and charge the rebels. On the other hand, Fulvius came down the hill like a torrent, and fell upon the archers with incredible fury. In this firſt attack Lentulus, the prince of the ſenate was dangerouſly wounded, and many perſons of diſtinction loſt their lives; for in the engagement the ſenators and knights were confounded with the common ſoldiers, and the people with their magiſtrates. The conſul meeting with a more vigorous oppoſition than he expected, proclaimed an amneſty for all thoſe, who ſhould lay down their arms, and at the ſame time ſet a price on the heads of Gracchus and Fulvius, promiſing to give their weight in gold to any one who ſhould bring them to him. This proclamation had the deſired effect; the populace ſlipt away one by one, and, deſerting their leaders, returned ſilently to their own houſes. Fulvius, ſeeing himſelf thus abandoned all of a ſudden, fled for refuge, with his eldeſt ſon, to a friend's houſe, and concealed himſelf in an old bathing-room, which was very very private and no longer in uſe. In the mean while, his enemies, greedy of the reward ſet upon his head, made a diligent ſearch after him, and not finding him, tho' they knew he could not be far off, threatened to burn down the whole neighbourhood. This terrified the owner of the houſe, to which Fulvius and his ſon had retired; however, he would not betray his friend himſelf, but directed another to ſhew where he was. Hereupon armed men entered the houſe, and killing both the father and the ſon, cut off their heads, with a deſign to preſent them to the conſul when the action was over [u].

A battle in Rome.

Fulvius killed.

In the mean time, Gracchus, who had not engaged in the battle, for fear of imbruing his hands in Roman blood, fled for refuge to the temple of Diana; but Licinius Craſſus, his brother-in-law, and Pomponius, a Roman knight, who attended him, adviſed him to make his eſcape through the gate Tergemina. He followed their advice, and, paſſing through the centre of the city, got to the bridge Sublicius, where his enemies, who purſued him cloſe, would have overtaken and ſeized him, if his two friends, Licinius and Pomponius, with as much intrepidity and reſolution, as Horatius Cocles had formerly exerted in the ſame place, had not oppoſed their fury. They defended the bridge againſt all the conſular troops, till Gracchus was out of their reach; but at length, being overpowered by numbers and covered with wounds, they both expired on the bridge, which they had ſo valiantly defended. In the mean while, Gracchus fled to a ſacred wood, dedicated to the Furies, and there ordered a generous ſlave, by name Euphorus, or, as others call him, Philoſtratus, who had attended him, to put an end to his life. The faithful ſlave, reſolving not to outlive his maſter, ſtabbed himſelf with the ſame dagger, which he had plunged into the breaſt of Gracchus, and expired with him. Others tell us, that, Gracchus being overtaken by thoſe who purſued him, Euphorus, embracing his maſter, covered him with his body; ſo that his enemies could not hurt him, without firſt killing the faithful ſlave, who, after receiving many wounds, breathed his laſt over Gracchus, whom the rabble ſoon diſpatched. As ſoon as he was dead, one of the multitude cut off his head; but as he was carrying it

The death of Gracchus.

like

[u] Plut. in Gracch. Appian. de bell. civil. l. i. Vell. Paterc. l. ii. Auth de vir. illuſt.

ike a trophy to the conſul, Lucius Septimuleius, who had ilways profeſſed a ſtrict friendſhip for Gracchus, ſnatched it out of his hand, and baſely went with it to the conſul, to get the reward ſet upon it, which was its weight in gold; but firſt he privately poured melted lead into the ſkull, and then delivered it to Opimius, who was ſo taken with the preſent, that he paid ſeventeen pounds and a half for it, without diſcovering the cheat. The body of Gracchus was firſt thrown into the Tiber, and afterwards carried to his mother Cornelia, who paid it all funeral honours. It is not agreed, whether Caius Gracchus had any thing in view prejudicial to the public liberty, in courting the favour of the people, and publiſhing ſo many laws to the diſadvantage of the ſenate. Some are of opinion that he aimed at the ſovereign power; others, that his deſign was only to eſtabliſh an equilibrium in the republic, and deliver the common people from the oppreſſions of the rich. His whole conduct ſeems to confirm the latter opinion; but thus much, however, muſt be allowed, that the methods he took were ſeditious, and that ambition and deſire of revenge carried him beyond the bounds of juſtice. He ſo far altered the conſtitution of the commonwealth, and diſturbed the public peace, particularly by the diſunion of patrons and clients, that the Roman ſtate became very unſettled and liable to any new revolution. Tho' his intentions might have been upright, yet there was room to fear, that ruin would be the effect of ſuch diſturbances in ſo corrupted a common-wealth. The people, inſtead of ſupporting their protector, deſerted him in his greateſt danger, and were not ſenſible of their loſs, till it was too late to retrieve it; but afterwards they erected ſtatues to the Gracchi, worſhipped them as gods, and inſtituted feſtivals in their honour [w].

Cruelty of Opimius.

On the other hand, the conſul Opimius, not ſatisfied with the death of Gracchus, of Fulvius, and above three thouſand of their party, who had been ſlain in the engagement on mount Aventine, impriſoned and condemned to die all the friends and adherents of the Gracchi whom he could diſcover. His ſeverity towards young Fulvius was highly blameable, and deſervedly condemned even by thoſe of his own party. The child had, notwithſtanding the conſul's prohibition, thought it his duty to obey obey his father, and return a ſecond time with terms of accommodation. This act of obedience and filial duty the brutiſh conſul looked upon as a great crime, and accordingly ſent a lictor to the young Roman in priſon, to acquaint him, that he muſt die, and to offer him in his name the liberty of chuſing what kind of death he thought the eaſieſt. The innocent youth, at this unexpected meſſage, burſt out into tears; which an Hetrurian aruſpex who was ſhut up in the ſame priſon, obſerving, Why all this buſtle, ſaid he, in parting with life? I will ſhew you how eaſy a thing it is to die. He had ſcarce uttered theſe words, when he took a leap, and daſhed his head againſt one of the lintels of the door with ſuch violence, that he died upon the ſpot. Young Fulvius followed his example, and, by a like death, put the inhuman conſul's orders in execution. After this, Opimius commanded the bodies of thoſe who had been killed on the Aventine, to the number of three thouſand, to be thrown into the Tiber, confiſcated their goods, and publiſhed an edict, forbidding their widows and relations to put on mourning for them. Licinia, the wife of Gracchus, was even deprived of her dowry. The cruel conſul, after having ſhed ſo much blood, was not aſhamed to build a temple to Concord, as if he had, by pacific meaſures, brought his fellow-citizens to an union. The people never ſaw this temple but with horror, and looked upon it as a monument of the cruelty of Opimius. As for the ſenate, they made it their chief buſineſs to extinguiſh even the memory of the laws publiſhed by the Gracchi. With this view they gained over one of the commiſſioners, and prevailed upon him to repreſent in the aſſembly of the people, that he met with unſurmountable difficulties in the enquiry after, and partition of, the lands; but that, to relieve the people, he would take care that every proprietor of ſuch lands ſhould pay a certain rent, proportionable to the quantity he poſſeſſed; and that the money, ariſing from theſe rents, ſhould be diſtributed among the poor citizens, who enjoyed no ſhare of thoſe public lands. He added, that, in conſideration of this payment, he was of opinion, that thoſe who poſſeſſed ſuch lands ſhould be acknowledged the lawful proprietors of them, with a diſcharge from all claims for the future; and that they ſhould be allowed afterwards to alienate and diſpoſe of theſe inheritances as they pleaſed; but the ſaid lands ſhould be always ſubject to the rent that ſhould be agreed upon. The people, ſeduced with the hopes of this advantage, advantage, paſſed the law, which abſolutely deſtroyed that of the Gracchi. Soon after, the rents, which the owners of the lands were to pay to the people, were ſuppreſſed, one of the tribunes of the people pretending, that the rich paid a ſufficient tribute to the public, by being at the charge of ſupporting the dignity of the commonwealth in the magiſtracies, with which they were inveſted. Thus the people were again reduced to their former wants, and ſubjected to the authority of the ſenate and the oppreſſions of the rich; a juſt puniſhment for their inconſtancy, and ingratitude to their benefactors, whom they baſely abandoned in their greateſt danger [x].

[w] Plut. & Appian. ibid. Vell. Paterc. l. ii. c. 7.

The Gracchian laws repealed. Year after the Flood, 2883. Before Chriſt, 116. Of Rome 632.

The ſucceſs of the Romans in Tranſalpine Gaul.

DURING theſe troubles at home, the late conſul Domitius was ſpreading with great ſucceſs the terror of the Roman arms in Tranſalpine Gaul. He had, during his conſulſhip, entirely ſettled the country of the Salyes in peace; a work happily begun by C. Sextius Calvinus three years before; but the Allobroges, whoſe country bordered on that of the Salyes, being uneaſy at the ſettlements of the Romans in their neighbourhood, began to riſe, with a deſign to fall upon the Roman colony at Aquæ Sextiæ. Hereupon Domitius, who was now only proconſul, having been ſucceeded by Q. Fabius Maximus the collegue of Opimius, to prevent the Arverni, a powerful people, from joining the Allobroges, entered into an alliance with their neighbours the Æqui, one of the moſt conſiderable nations in Tranſalpine Gaul. Upon this the Arverni began hoſtilities with the Æqui, who complained to Domitius; and the Roman general took occaſion from thence to force himſelf a paſſage into the country of the Arverni. He had ſcarce entered it, when the king of the Arverni, named Bituitus, or, according to the Celtic orthography, Bituitick, ſent a deputation to the proconſul, which was quite a new ſcene to the Romans. The head of the embaſſy was very richly dreſſed, and followed by a great number of attendants; but his chief guard conſiſted of a company of huge dogs, that followed him in good order, like regular troops. By his ſide walked a bard, that is, according to Feſtus, a prieſt, who, being a ſkilful verſifier in the language of his country, ſung the praiſes of his king, his people, and the embaſſador. The proconſul received the embaſſador with great civility, who, aſſuming an imperious air, commanded him, in the name of his maſter, to forbear bear moleſting the Allobroges, and to retire forthwith from all Gaul. Domitius, who was not a man to be terrified by ſuch rhodomontades, turned his back upon the embaſſador and his bard, without deigning to give them an anſwer, and immediately led his troops into the fruitful plains of the Cavari. While he was encamped there near a village called Vindalia, not far from the place where the Sulga, now the Sorgue, falls into the Rhone, an innumerable multitude of Allobroges came to attack him; but were eaſily routed by the proconſul's regular and well diſciplined troops. We are told, that twenty thouſand Gauls were killed on the ſpot, and three thouſand made priſoners of war [y].

[x] Plut. Appian. Vell. Paterc. ibid.

The Allobroges defeated with great ſlaughter.

THE defeat of the Allobroges put the powerful nation of the Arverni in motion. Bitultick raiſed an army of two hundred thouſand men, and marched againſt the Romans, whom they found encamped in the country of the Cavari. The Roman army, thirty thouſand ſtrong, was commanded by Q. Fabius Maximus, who came from Rome during the troubles raiſed by Gracchus, but was now become proconſul, P. Manlius and C. Papirius Carbo having been raiſed to the conſulate. Domitius had ſurrendered the command to Fabius, but ſtill continued in the camp to aſſiſt the general with his advice. Bitultick, who placed too great confidence in his numbers, when he ſaw the Roman camp, deſpiſed ſo weak an enemy, and turning to thoſe who attended him, This handful of men, ſaid he, will ſcarce be ſufficient to feed the dogs that follow me. When he began the attack, the proconſul Fabius, who had a quartan ague, was in the height of one of his fits; however, he drew up the legions himſelf, and, being carried through the ranks, encouraged his ſoldiers to behave like true Romans. The Gauls, who were utterly undiſciplined and without experience, were ſoon put to the rout, and vaſt numbers of them ſlain. And then Domitius, deſirous to ſhare the glory of the day with Fabius, ſent to invite the king of the Arverni, who had not yet left the field of battle, to an interview. The credulous Gaul accepted the invitation, and came to meet Domitius with a ſmall attendance at the place appointed; but, to his great ſurprize, ſaw himſelf all on a ſudden ſurrounded by Domitius's guards. The betrayed king called for vengeance from the gods,

And the Arverni.

The treachery of Domitius.

[y] Strabo, l. iv. Flor. l. iii. c. 2. Vell. Paterc. l. iii. Appian. apud Fulvium. Oroſ. l. v. c. 13.

gods, protectors of faith, but in vain; the baſe Roman telling him, that he muſt go to Rome, to give an account of his conduct to the ſenate. Accordingly he was ſent under a ſtrong guard to Marſeilles, and there put on board a veſſel, which conveyed him to Rome [z]. The Allobroges, upon the news of the victory gained by Fabius over their friends the Arverni, immediately ſubmitted. As for the Arverni, the captivity of their king and the loſs they had ſuſtained in the battle, which is ſaid to have amounted to an hundred and twenty thouſand men, either killed or drowned in the Rhone, ſo diſheartened them, that they ſent embaſſadors to ſolicit a peace; which was granted them upon very reaſonable terms, the proconſul only requiring of them, that they ſhould continue at home, and not diſturb the Æqui, or any of the neighbouring nations. Fabius and Domitius, having thus ſettled the eaſtern part of Gaul in peace, returned to Rome, where the ſenate approved of the baſeneſs of Domitius, and not only detained the injured Bitultick, and expoſed him in the triumphs of his conquerors, but, by a freſh act of injuſtice, ordered the conſul P. Manlius, who was then ſetting out for Gaul, to ſend Congeniatus, the ſon of Bitultick, to Rome. The young prince indeed was entertained and educated at Rome in a manner ſuitable to his rank; and therefore, when returned to his dominions, maintained to the laſt a great friendſhip and eſteem for the Romans, by whom he had been educated. As for the unhappy Bitultick, after he had been baſely obliged by the ſenate to grace the triumphs of Domitius and Fabius, he was confined to the city of Alba, where he ſpent the reſt of his days, the ſenate being afraid, leſt he ſhould renew the war, if they allowed him to return to his own dominions [a]. Thus were all rules of equity, and even the laws of nations, ſhamefully neglected and trod under foot by the ſenate, when they came in competition with the intereſt of their republic.

The Allobroges and Arverni ſubmit. Year after the Flood, 2884. Before Chriſt, 115. Of Rome, 633.

THIS year ended with a remarkable trial: P. Decius Mus, one of the tribunes of the people, accuſed the late conſul Opimius, and cited him to appear before the comitia. The crimes laid to his charge were, his having put to death a great number of citizens on the Aventine, and afterwards ſentenced others to die, and cauſed them to be executed, before the people had condemned them; a cauſe of the utmoſt importance to both parties, and debated with great warmth. Decius, no mean orator, maintained, that Opimius had tranſgreſſed the law enacting that no citizen ſhould be put to death, but by a decree of the people; and pretended, that if the people gave up their right in this inſtance, the defenders of the people would undergo the fate of the Gracchi, whenever the ſenate ſhould think fit. They will declare them, ſaid he, dangerous citizens, and then death will be the reward of their zeal for the intereſt of the people. On the other hand, the conſul Papirius Carbo undertook the defence of Opimius, and by ſhewing to the multitude how dangerous it was, and inconſiſtent with reaſon, that ſeditious men and rebels ſhould have no other judges or avengers but themſelves, prevailed upon them to acquit Opimius, and thereby declare, that it was lawful for a conſul, when empowered by the ſenate, to deliver the republic from a dangerous citizen, without waiting for the conſent of the people aſſembled in comitia. Thus was tranquillity reſtored to the city. The ſenate recovered their antient aſcendant over the people, who bore their mild government without complaints; but this tranquillity was ſoon diſturbed by new commotions, which greatly ſhook the conſular ſtate, and paved the way for an abſolute monarchy. Theſe civil diſturbances, and ſome foreign wars, together with the riſe, progreſs, declenſion, total ruin of the imperial ſtate, ſinking under the weight of its own greatneſs, will be the ſubject of the following chapters.

Opimius accuſed before the people.

[z] Appian. in Celtic. Vell. Paterc. l. ix. c. 6. [a] Flor. l. iii. c. 2. Vell. Paterc. ibid. Jul. Cæſ. comment. l. i. Diodor. Sicul. apud Valeſ.

And acquitted.

CHAP. IX.

The hiſtory of Rome, from the end of the ſedition of the Gracchi to the perpetual dictatorſhip of Sylla.

THE civil commotions of the republic being allayed, by the death of the Gracchi and the abolition of their laws, as we have related in the foregoing chapter, L. Cæcilius Metellus, the nephew of the great Metellus, ſurnamed Macedonicus, and L. Aurelius Cotta were, without out any diſturbance or oppoſition, raiſed to the conſulate. The latter was ſent into Tranſalpine Gaul, with a conſular army to keep the Allobroges and Arverni in awe, and the former into Illyricum to reduce the Segeſtani (A), who had ſhaken off the Roman yoke. The conſul defeated them in the field, and made himſelf maſter of their city and territory; but, as this expedition was not of importance enough to procure him a triumph, he made war unjuſtly on the Dalmatians, who, not being in a condition to withſtand a conſular army, voluntarily ſubmitted to him; ſo that he ſpent the winter in tranquillity at Salona (B), the capital of the country. Nevertheleſs, he aſſumed the ſurname of Dalmaticus, aud was honoured with a triumph for his pretended conqueſt [a].

The Dalmatians ſubdued.

In the mean time, a young orator had courage enough to impeach the late conſul Papirius Carbo, at the tribunal of the prætor Q. Fabius Eburnus, who had been commiſſioned by the ſenate to try ſtate-criminals. The orator's name was L. Licinius Craſſus. No Roman had ever been endowed by nature with greater talents for eloquence, which he had carefully improved, though but twenty years of age, by a ſtrict application to ſtudy. As he was of the Licinian family, and nearly related to Licinia, the wife of C. Gracchus, he reſolved to do all that lay in his power to deſtroy Papirius Carbo, a ſworn enemy to the Gracchian party. Papirius had formerly been zealous for the people and the Gracchi, even to madneſs, and had been ſuſpected of having aſſaſſinated the ſecond Africanus. But, having ſince changed his party, and with it his ſentiments, he had devoted himſelf entirely to the intereſt of the nobility, who had promoted him to the conſulate, and looked upon him as one of the chief ſupporters of their cauſe; ſo that he had great intereſt, and, beſides, was himſelf an Papirius Carbo accuſed by young Craſſus.

[a] Appian. in Illyric. Vell. Patercul. l. ii.

(A) Segeſta, formerly a city of upper Pannonia, is long ſince deſtroyed. There are only ſome of its ruins remaining on the banks of the Save, near the mouth of the Kulp and the little city of Siſeg.

(B) The antient city of Salona in Dalmatia ſtood about ten miles from the gulph of that name, on the coaſt of the Adriatic ſea, at a ſmall diſtance from the place where the preſent city of Spalatro ſtands. It was once famous for the retreat of the emperor Dioclefian, but is now buried in its ruins.

orator of no mean character, as appeared in the cauſe of Opimius, which he defended with uncommon ſucceſs, having by force of perſuaſion induced the people to give judgment againſt their own intereſt. Nevertheleſs the love of revenge prompted young Craſſus to attempt the deſtroying of this powerful enemy to the Gracchian faction. He reduced the whole impeachment to theſe three articles; 1ſt, That he had ſtirred up the elder Gracchus to demand the tribuneſhip a ſecond year; 2dly, That he had made a law for this purpoſe, when he was tribune; and, 3dly, That he had been, at leaſt, an accomplice in the aſſaſſination of the Second Africanus. Theſe were heavy accuſations; and Craſſus might have eaſily proved them, had not his probity got the aſcendant over all his paſſions. For one of Papirius's ſlaves, being angry with his maſter, ſtole the box in which he kept all his papers, and brought it to the accuſer. But the generous Roman had ſuch an abhorrence of the treachery, that he ſent back the ſlave in chains, and the box unopened, ſaying, that he had rather let an enemy and a criminal eſcape unpuniſhed, than deſtroy him by baſe and diſhonourable means. On the day appointed, the cauſe was pleaded before the prætor and a very numerous aſſembly, all Rome flocking to hear the firſt eſſay of a young orator, who had never yet diſplayed his talents but in the ſchools. When he aſcended the roſtra, he was ſo intimidated at the ſight of ſo crouded an audience, that, his heart failing him, he looked pale, and was ready to faint. The prætor, obſerving the confuſion he was in, adjourned the court to the next day. Then the croud was ſtill greater; but the young orator took courage, and ſpoke with ſuch energy and life, that the accuſed, ſinking into deſpair, did juſtice on himſelf. Some ſay, that he went into baniſhment; but Valerius Maximus aſſures us, that he poiſoned himſelf with cantharides to avoid a more ſhameful death [b]. From this time Craſſus gained the reputation of the greateſt orator Rome had ever bred. His oration was put into the hands of all young orators, and long after looked upon by Cicero himſelf as an inimitable performance [c].

Papirius lays violent hands on himſelf.

Marius, his birth, education, &c.

DURING the preſent conſulate, the famous Caius Marius firſt appeared in a public office. He was of ſo mean extraction, that even the village where he was born is not certainly certainly known. All that is certain of his origin is, that he was a native of the country of the Arpinates in the territory of the Volſci; that his father's name was Marius, and his mother's Fucinia. He was a man of an extraordinary ſize, of great ſtrength of body, of an uncommon underſtanding, courageous, and enterpriſing; but at the ſame time of a fierce aſpect, and, as he had ſpent great part of his youth in the country, where he had been brought up in ruſtic employments, in his manners a perfect ſavage. As ſoon as he attained to the military age, he entered into the army, and gave the firſt proofs of his courage and intrepidity at the ſiege of Numantia. Scipio, with whom he made his firſt campaign, diſcovering under a rough outſide a great fund of underſtanding and bravery, told his officers, that young Marius, however clowniſh, would one day be an honour to the republic, and prove one of her greateſt generals. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf on all occaſions by actions of uncommon valour, but more by an exact obſervance of military diſcipline. He went through all the degrees in the army, and every ſtep he roſe was in reward of ſome action, with which he had ſignalized himſelf. He now began to ſolicit civil magiſtracies, and ſtood for the tribuneſhip of the people, which he obtained, and diſcharged with the ſame intrepidity he had ſhewn in the field. He propoſed a new law relating to the manner of collecting the ſuffrages in the election of the curule magiſtrates: this the conſul Cotta oppoſed, and even cited the tribune to appear before the ſenate, and anſwer for his conduct. Marius obeyed the ſummons; but, inſtead of being daunted, threatened to exert his authority, and ſend the conſul to priſon, if he perſiſted in his oppoſition. Metellus, then prince of the ſenate, though the patron and friend of Marius, declared for Cotta. Whereupon the bold tribune, without ſhewing the leaſt regard for that venerable ſenator, to whom he was indebted for his fortune, and by whoſe intereſt he had even obtained the tribuneſhip, ordered one of his officers to ſeize him and carry him to priſon. His orders had been put in execution, if the conſul had not waved his oppoſition, and the ſenate given their conſent to the law. The boldneſs of the new tribune ſurpriſed the conſcript fathers, but gained him great reputation among the people, who from this time began to look upon him as their chief protector, againſt the incroachments of the nobility [d].

[b] Val. Max. l. iii. c. 7. [c] Cic. de orat. l. i. & iii. in Bruto, & paſſim alibi.

Marius tribune of the people.

His intrepidity.

THE

[d] Plut. in Mario. Val. Max. l. vi. c. 9. Cic. de legib. l. iii.

THE tribuneſhip of Marius expired almoſt at the ſame time that Rome choſe new conſuls. Theſe were M. Porcius Cato, grandſon to the great Cato, but by his firſt wife, and Q. Marcius, ſurnamed Rex. The former died ſoon in Numidia, whither he had been ſent to watch the ſteps of Jugurtha, who had uſurped that kingdom; ſo that Marcius remained the ſole head of the republic for almoſt the whole year. The province which fell to his lot was Tranſalpine Gaul, where he opened a way for the Roman armies from the Alps to the Pyrenees; a work of an immenſe labour and great danger. For the Stœni, a fierce nation and fond of liberty, whom Stephanus places at the foot of the Maritime Alps, took arms, and oppoſed Marcius's deſign with great courage. But when they found themſelves ſurrounded by the Romans, they ſet fire to their houſes, killed their wives and children, and then threw themſelves into the flames; ſo that not one of them ſurvived the loſs of their liberty. After this, Marcius, to ſecure his conqueſt, planted a colony in the country of the Volcæ Tectoſages, who antiently poſſeſſed all that tract which lies between the Pyrenees to the ſouth, and the preſent city of Toulouſe to the north. The city which Marcius founded was called by his name Narbo-Marcius. Such was the origin of the famous city of Narbonne, which in proceſs of time became the capital of a great country, and a convenient place of refreſhment for the Roman armies, when they paſſed from the Pyrenees to the Alps, or from the Alps to the Pyrenees. The ſenate thought the reduction of this part of Gaul, the opening of a way from the Alps to the Pyrenees, and the founding of the city of Narbonne, ſo conſiderable works, that they honoured Marcius, upon his return to Rome, with a triumph[e].

The courage of the Stœni.

THE conſulate of L. Cæcilius Metellus and Q. Mucius Scævola proved ſo peaceable, that the Romans had little elſe to do, but attend their ſuperſtitions, Rome being filled with reports of prodigies. The ſucceeding conſuls, C. Licinius Geta and Q. Fabius Eburnus, had as little opportunity of acquiring glory as their predeceſſors. In their conſulate C. Marius ſtood for the prætorſhip, and with great difficulty obtained it by the moſt bare-faced bribery and corruption. For this he was accuſed before the people, but, but, they being divided in their opinions, he was acquitted. As he had a great deal of good ſenſe, and a penetrating underſtanding, he preſided in the court of judicature, which was aſſigned him as prætor, without reproach. The next year it fell to his lot to govern Further Spain, which he did with great equity and moderation. He cleared his government of the banditti, who had long infeſted it, and cured thoſe people of their antient cuſtom of living by rapine [f]. The next year, Æmilius Scaurus and L. Cæcilius Metellus were created conſuls. The latter was the ſon of the famous Metellus Macedonicus, and the former an intrepid ſoldier, a brave officer, and eloquent orator. Scaurus propoſed ſeveral laws, and got them paſſed in the comitia, in ſpite of the tribunes, who had for ſome time ingroſſed to themſelves the prerogative of propoſing laws. By one of theſe he reſtrained the exceſſive luxury of the Romans, forbidding them to eat dormice, foreign ſhell-fiſh, and ſuch birds as were brought from diſtant countries. By another he left the freedmen, who had been long confined to the Eſquiline tribe, at liberty to inrol themſelves in any of the four city-tribes, which they liked beſt. His zeal for maintaining ſome order in Rome, in ſpite of the general depravity of manners, was ſeconded by the cenſors, L. Metellus Dalmaticus and Cn. Domitius Ahenobarbus, who ſtruck thirty two unworthy ſenators out of the roll, and among them Licinius Geta the late conſul; proſcribed games of hazard and concerts of muſic; and, after having nominated the conſul Scaurus prince of the ſenate, finiſhed their office with a cenſus, in which were counted 394336 citizens able to bear arms. From Rome, Scaurus ſet out for Gaul, where he ſubdued the Gentiſci and Carni, and ſpent the reſt of the ſummer in making a good road from Rome to the Alps, for the more convenient marching of the armies, which had been hitherto obliged to march through a miry and almoſt impaſſable country. For this important piece of ſervice the ſenate and people granted him a triumph, which his eaſy victory over the Gentiſci and Carni had not deſerved [g].

Marius created prætor.

[e] Feſt. Capitol. Cic. pro Fonteio.

The Gentiſci and Carni ſubdued.

THE next year, M. Acilius Balbus and C. Porcius Cato, the grandſon of Cato the cenſor, were raiſed to the conſulate. The latter was ſent into Macedon to oppoſe the Scordiſci, [f] Plut. in Mar. c. 3. Strab. l. v.

[g] Auth. de vir. illuſtr. Front. ſtrat. l. iv.

The Roman army cut off by the Scordiſci.

Scordiſci, a people of Thrace, who had invaded that province. The barbarians were at firſt terrified at the ſight of a conſular army, but, afterwards taking courage, faced the conſul, and, having drawn him into a country full of rocks, foreſts, and narrow paſſes, cut off all his army to a man, Porcius alone having ſaved himſelf by flight. The republic had not for a long time ſuffered ſuch a defeat. The hiſtorians ſpeak of it with aſtoniſhment, and tell us, that it would have alarmed the city as much as the battle of Cannæ did formerly, if ſuch a misfortune had happened in the heart of Italy. The Scordiſci, after ſo complete a victory, laid waſte Macedon, ſpread themſelves all over Theſſaly, and advanced to the coaſts of the Adriatic, into which, becauſe it put a ſtop to their incurſions, they diſcharged, in revenge, a ſhower of darts. But T. Didius, the Roman prætor in Illyricum, ſoon repaired the loſs which the republic had ſuſtained, and drove the enemy back, with great ſlaughter, to their own country. For this the republic honoured him with a triumph. As for Porcius Cato, though the ſenate and people did not condemn him for his misfortune, they accuſed him unjuſtly of oppreſſion, and under that pretence baniſhed him to Tarracon in Spain, where he ſpent the remainder of his days. A puniſhment not ſo juſt, as in point of prudence neceſſary, in order to deter Roman generals for the future from expoſing their troops too raſhly to the mercy of barbarians [h].

The Scordiſci defeated by T. Didius.

The incontinence of the veſtals puniſhed.

THIS ſame year an infamous commerce was diſcovered between ſeveral veſtals and their gallants. The intrigue was begun by L. Betucius Barrus, a Roman knight, but a profeſſed debauchee, who gloried in corrupting women of the greateſt families and beſt characters. He carried on an amour with a veſtal named Æmilia, who drew in two others, Licinia and Marcia, to the like crimes. Upon the accuſation of a ſlave, Betucius and Æmilia were condemned to the uſual puniſhment, but Licinia and Marcia, though no leſs guilty, acquitted, the pontifices being afraid, leſt the condemning of ſo many criminals at once might bring the whole ſacerdotal order into diſrepute. This raiſed great murmurs among the people; and Seduceius, one of the tribunes, revived the affair, ſhewed the iniquity of the judgment of the pontifices, and brought the cauſe cauſe before the people, who nominated L. Craſſus, one of the prætors, to rehear it. Craſſus was a man of known integrity; but ſo ſevere, that his court was called the wreck of criminals. He without any regard to the birth of the accuſed, or the ſentence paſſed in their favour, or the rights of the pontifical college, or the eloquence of the famous L. Craſſus, who pleaded for his relation Licinia, condemned the two veſtals to be buried alive, and their gallants to be whipped to death. Nor did this ſatisfy the people: a temple was built at the public expence to Venus, under the appellation of Verticordia, becauſe that goddeſs was in this temple to be implored to turn the hearts of the Roman women to virtue. So that Venus was now invoked for chaſtity. The honour of conſecrating this temple was conferred upon Sulpicia, the daughter of Servius Sulpicius Paterculus, who, though very young and lately married to Q. Fulvius Flaccus, had given ſuch proofs of an extraordinary modeſty, that ſhe was deemed the moſt chaſt woman in Rome [i].

[h] Vell. Paterc. l. ii. c. 8. Cic. in Ver. & pro Balbo. Diodor. Sicul. apud. Valeſ. Flor. l. iii. c. 3.

A temple erected to Venus Verticordia.

In the mean time, Rome was alarmed with accounts of an inundation of barbarians. The moſt northern part of Germany was inhabited by a nation ſaid to have been originally deſcended from the Aſiatic Cimmerians, and to have taken the name of Cimbri, when they changed their old habitations. Theſe people were now ſettled near the ocean, in the peninſula which we call Jutland, and the antients Cimbrica Cherſoneſus. But, being tired of cultivating a cold country, ſhut up between two ſeas, they left their peninſula with their wives and children, and, joining the Teutones a neighbouring nation, took their journey ſouthward, and fell upon the country which the Boii had long poſſeſſed, not far from the Hercynian foreſt. The Boii ſoon drove them out of their country, and obliged them to carry war and devaſtation into other parts. They then fell on the Scordiſci, whom Didius had juſt driven back to the banks of the Danube; and from thence, advancing ſtill nearer to the Roman provinces, they penetrated into Vindelicia (C), and there ravaged the country of the Tauriſci.

An inundation of Cimbri and Teutones.

The

[i] Cic. in Brut. Val. Max. l. iii. & viii. Ovid. Faſt. l. v.

(C) Vindelicia contained part of the preſent biſhoprick of Conſtance, of the Tirol, of the biſhoprick of Paſſau, all Upper and part of Lower Bavaria. Some geographers are of opinion, that all the countries between the Inn and the lake of Bergentz belonged formerly to Vindelicia.

The approach of theſe barbarians made Rome tremble; the new conſuls therefore, Caius Cæcilius Metellus, the fourth ſon of Metellus Macedonicus, and Cn. Papirius Carbo, the ſon of the ſeditious Caius Carbo, were no ſooner choſen, than the ſenate ordered the latter to wait for the Cimbri at the furtheſt parts of the eaſtern Alps, and ſtop the paſſages againſt them. As for Metellus, he was ordered into Macedon to finiſh the war with the Scordiſci, whom he drove from poſt to poſt, and ſo weakened by repeated battles, that he put them out of a condition of making for ſome time any new attempts upon the Roman provinces. Upon his return he was honoured with a triumph, in which there was this moſt agreeable circumſtance, that his brother, who had been conſul a year before him, and was now returned from ſuppreſſing a rebellion in Sardinia and Corſica after two years labour, was ordered to triumph with him. The conſul Papirius was not ſo ſucceſsful againſt the Cimbri, who offered him a peace, which he pretended to accept; but afterwards, by corrupting their guides, treacherouſly drew them into a ſnare, as he imagined, and attacked their camp. Papirius promiſed himſelf certain victory. But what difficulties cannot a warlike people ſurmount, when actuated by deſpair and indignation? They ran to arms, and not only repulſed the legions, but, becoming the aggreſſors, fell upon them with ſuch fury, that they put them in diſorder, and obliged them to betake themſelves to a ſhameful flight. The Romans fled in great confuſion to the neighbouring foreſts, and there lay concealed for three days, without daring to appear in the open country. Upon the news of this defeat, the conſternation at Rome was univerſal. No-body doubted, but the barbarians would immediately paſs the Alps, over-run the provinces neareſt to the capital, and attempt the deſtruction of Rome itſelf. But the Cimbri, upon what motive is utterly unknown, by a kind of miracle turned their arms elſewhere, and marching towards the country of the Helvetii (D), entered that Metellus defeats the Scordiſci.

The Romans defeated by the Cimbri.

(D) The Helvetii at the time we are ſpeaking of, and for ſome ages after, were reckoned among the Gauliſh nations. Strabo and Cæſar divide their country into four cantons, viz. Tigurinus Pagus, Tugenus Pagus, Ambrones, and Urbigenus Pagus. The firſt contained the cantons of Zurich, Appenzell, Shaffhauſen, and Rhintall; the ſecond the cantons of Zug, Glaris, Schwitz, and Uri; the third a ſmall part of the canton of Friburg, and the whole that way Tranſalpine Gaul, which they filled with deſolation and ſlaughter. This miraculous deliverance quickened the zeal of the Romans in puniſhing all accomplices in the late guilt of the veſtals. Among others, the famous orator M. Antonius, the grandfather of Mark Antony the triumvir, was ſuſpected of having kept an unlawful commerce with the condemned veſtals. He was then in the flower of his age, had been very lately nominated to the quæſtorſhip of Aſia, and was already got to Brunduſium, in order to embarque for Pergamus. But, when advice was brought him that his reputation was attacked, he immediately returned to Rome, appeared before the ſevere prætor Caſſius, and deſired, that his cauſe might be heard without delay. The judge endeavoured to intimidate him by threatening to put his young ſlave to the torture, who was ſaid to have been privy to his amours; but the ſlave offered himſelf to the rack, with an aſſurance which induced the judge to ſpare him. Valerius Maximus tells us, that the faithful ſlave endured the moſt cruel tortures, with an intrepidity, which ſurpriſed the judge [k]. However that be, the quæſtor of Aſia was acquitted, and ſet out for his province with more honour, than if he had not been accuſed [l]. And now Rome was in ſuch tranquillity, that ſhe had only one war to finiſh, viz. that with the Scordiſci, who were already weakened, but ſtill very haughty, and ready to take arms again, as ſoon as the Roman armies ſhould leave Macedon. The elections therefore were no ſooner over, than M. Livius Druſus, who was raiſed to the conſulate with L. Calpurnius Piſo, was ſent againſt them, while his collegue covered Italy againſt the invaſion of the Cimbri, whoſe return was ſtill dreaded. Druſus prevailed upon the Scordiſci, partly by force and partly by capitulation, to quit the country they poſſeſſed, and repaſs the Danube, which river from this time became a barrier between them and the Roman provinces. The conſul upon his return was honoured with a triumph. And now the tranquillity was ſo general, in all the

M. Antonius the famous orator accuſed, And acquitted. The Scordiſci ſettle on the other ſide of the Danube.

[k] Val. Max. l. vi. c. 8. [l] Strab. l. v. Plin. l. iii. Vell. Patercul. l. ii.

whole cantons of Lucern, Bern, Solothurn, and Underwald; and laſtly, the fourth contained the greateſt part of the canton of Friburg, the principality of Neufchattel, and part of the Pais Romain. The country of the Rauraci, now the canton of Baſle, was afterwards added to the Helvetic body.

the countries subject to the republic, that she would have shut the temple of Janus, if she had not been under some apprehensions from Jugurtha, whose wars make a considerable part of this history, and therefore must be traced a little farther back.

Birth, education, &c. of Jugurtha.

MASINSSA, king of Numidia, who had been so remarkably devoted to the Romans, left three sons, Micipsa, Manastabal, and Gulussa, joint-heirs of his kingdom, which they long governed in perfect amity. At length Micipsa, surviving his two brothers, possessed the throne alone. This good king had two legitimate sons, Adherbal and Hiempsal. His brother Manastabal had likewise two sons, Jugurtha and Gauda, by two different mistresses; and Gulussa had a son, named Massiva, by a concubine. But, as natural children had no right to the crown, according to the laws of Numidia, Jugurtha, Gauda, and Massiva, were by their illegitimacy excluded from succeeding to the kingdom, so long as Adherbal and Hiempsal, the lawful heirs, were alive. Jugurtha was born before the death of his grandfather Masinissa; but that wise king never acknowledged him as a prince of the blood-royal. However, Micipsa had so much regard for his brother Manastabal, that he caused Jugurtha to be brought up in the royal palace with the young princes his children. But afterwards, growing jealous of him, he sent him to the siege of Numantia, in hopes of getting rid of him. Jugurtha distinguished himself at that memorable siege in a very eminent manner, and, upon the taking of the place, returned home loaded with glory, and brought with him recommendatory letters from Scipio, under whom he had served. And now age and experience having put a stop to his youthful sallies, he was so far from giving umbrage to the king, that by his prudent conduct he gained his favour, and cultivated his friendship with such address, that the easy prince adopted him two years before his death, and thereby made him capable of succeeding, as joint-heir to his kingdom, with his own children. No sooner was the old king dead, than disputes arose among the three heirs of the kingdom. After some days had been decently spent in mourning, they met to deliberate about the affairs of the new government, when Jugurtha, who was the eldest, seated himself in the middle of the throne, which was prepared for the new kings. Hereupon Hiempsal, who was the youngest, thinking himself injured by the superiority which Jugurtha assumed, seated himself by Adherbal's side, in order to give him the middle place, which was deemed by by the Numidians, as by moſt other nations, the moſt honourable; and it was not without much difficulty, that his brother prevailed on him to pay ſome regard to ſuperior age, and remove to Jugurtha's left-hand. As ſoon as the diſputes about the ceremonial were ended, Jugurtha propoſed the diſannulling of all the edicts the late king had publiſhed within the laſt five years, under pretence, that Micipſa's underſtanding being then impaired by age, he had iſſued many ordinances prejudicial to the welfare of the kingdom. Hiempſal replied with a diſdainful air, I am willing to come into the propoſal; and we will begin with diſannulling the act, whereby you was aſſociated with us in the inheritance of the crown; ſince this was done within the time which you have fixed for my father's dotage. Theſe reproachful words ſunk ſo deep into Jugurtha's mind, that thenceforth he made it his whole buſineſs to find an opportunity of ridding himſelf privately of a young prince, who might thwart his ambitious ſchemes. For we are told, that he had formed a deſign long before, when he ſerved in Spain, of extorting the crown by force from his two couſins. At the ſiege of Numantia, he had contracted friendſhips with ſeveral young Roman officers, who had rouzed his ambition, by ſtirring him up boldly to ſeize the kingdom, as ſoon as the old king's eyes ſhould be cloſed. They told him, that he would find friends and protectors enough at Rome, where any point might be carried with money and intereſt. Jugurtha therefore to gratify his ambition, and at the ſame time revenge the late affront, ſuborned the chief officer of Hiempſal's guard to murder him? which he did to the great grief of the Numidians, who had founded their hopes on his courage and uncommon underſtanding. The head of the young prince, thus treacherouſly aſſaſſinated in the flower of his age, was carried to Jugurtha, who beheld it with pleaſure. Though ſuch a notorious piece of cruelty and perfidiouſneſs ought naturally to have driven all the Numidians into a revolt; yet they were divided among themſelves. Thoſe who hoped to reap advantage from the public confuſions, ſided with Jugurtha, while the wiſe and the virtuous, who had the good of their country at heart, declared for the pacific Adherbal. But, as the latter were by far the weakeſt, the young prince, though not very ſagacious, had penetration enough to ſee, that his only refuge was in the protection of the Romans, to whom his rival could not but be ſuſpected. He therefore acquainted the conſcript fathers with the baſe aſſaſſination of his brother, Hiempſal affronts Jugurtha.

Hiempſal murdered by Jugurtha's orders.

and at the same time, foreseeing that the deliberations of the senate would take up much time, he began to levy troops, and put himself upon his defence against any attempt of Jugurtha. But this warlike prince soon got the ascendant over his surviving rival, and, by taking some cities by assault and forcing others to capitulate, made himself master of almost the whole kingdom. Hereupon Adherbal, having no asylum but Rome, conveyed himself thither, in order to lay his complaints before the senate. Jugurtha was no sooner informed of his design, than he sent embassadors to the capital, well furnished with money to gain over the republic to his interest. He was well apprised, that all things were venal at Rome; and therefore ordered his embassadors to spare no expence in gaining him new friends, and in cultivating the friendships he had formerly contracted, when in Spain. Upon their arrival they found the senate strongly prepossessed against their master, but met with few senators, who were proof against their presents. When the day came, on which Adherbal and the embassadors were admitted before the senate, it was easy to perceive, by the debates of the conscript fathers, what effect had been wrought by Jugurtha's money. The just complaints of Adherbal were despised, Jugurtha's courage extolled, and his crimes palliated. M. Æmilius Scaurus, then prince of the senate, declared for Adherbal, and with him a few others; but a great majority were against him. The senate therefore, without taking any notice of the assassination of Hiempsal, or the usurpation of Jugurtha, only appointed ten commissioners to go into Africa, and divide the kingdom between the two rivals. Lucius Opimius, so famous for his zeal against the faction of Caius Gracchus, was at the head of this commission; and, as he had declared for Adherbal at Rome, Jugurtha had reason to fear his arrival and determinations. But this formidable judge, who had avenged the cause of the republic against the Gracchi and their powerful party, was no sooner arrived in Africa with his collegues, than Jugurtha gained them all over with the immense sums he sent them. They found him innocent, made Hiempsal the aggressor, and declared that his death had been occasioned by his own rashness. After they had pronounced this iniquitous sentence, they came to the division of Micipsa's dominions, which was made upon the plan proposed by Jugurtha himself. To him were allotted the strongest places and the richest provinces, without any regard to the complaints of Adherbal

Adherbal flies to Rome.

The corruption of the Roman senate.

bal, who, though thus injured, ſubmitted to the judgment of the commiſſioners, and thought of nothing but reigning in peace over the ſubjects which Rome had aſſigned him [m].

Jugurtha begins the war anew.

But the ambitious Jugurtha, finding that there was nothing to fear from the part of Rome, reſolved to make himſelf maſter of all Numidia. With this view he entered the frontiers of his brother's kingdom at the head of his troops, laid waſte the country with fire and ſword, pillaged the villages, and committed every-where moſt dreadful devaſtations. He hoped by theſe inſults to provoke the reſentment of Adherbal, and induce him to uſe repriſals, whence he might have a pretence to drive him from his kingdom, and to juſtify his conduct at Rome. But the timorous prince contented himſelf with ſending an embaſſy to Jugurtha to complain of the injuſtice of his proceedings. Nor could even the ill treatment which his embaſſador's received at Jugurtha's court, provoke him to take arms. Hereupon Jugurtha, without troubling himſelf any longer about pretences, entered his dominions at the head of a numerous army, and encamped near Cirtha. Then Adherbal, ſeeing himſelf reduced to the neceſſity of taking the field, or flying his country a ſecond time, thought it more adviſeable to run any hazards, than trouble Rome again with his complaints. Having therefore aſſembled his forces and made new levies, he brought an army into the field, but more conſiderable for its number than courage. As he came in ſight of the enemy, when the day was far ſpent and it was too late to engage, he encamped in haſte, in order to reſt his troops fatigued with long marches. But Jugurtha, without waiting for the return of the day, attacked his brother's trenches in the dead of the night, forced them, and put all to the ſword who withſtood him. Adherbal's army was diſperſed in an inſtant, and the king himſelf forced to take refuge in Cirtha his capital. Jugurtha ſought every-where for his rival, whom it was his chief buſineſs to deſtroy; but the prince had the good luck in his misfortunes to eſcape the fury of his enemy. Some Italian cohorts he had in his army covered his retreat, and hindered the conquerors from entering the city with the conquered. Had it not been for this ſeaſonable relief, the war had been begun and ended the ſame day. However, the ſiege of Cirtha was not delayed a moment. Jugurtha, who well remembered Adherbal defeated.

Cirtha beſieged.

[m] Salluſt. bell. Jugurth.

membered the leſſons he had learnt of Scipio before Numantia, puſhed it on with great vigor; but the valour of the Italian troops protracted it longer than he expected. In the mean time, news was brought to Rome of theſe unwarrantable proceedings; but the uſurper's money had ſuch an effect there, that the ſenate ſent only a kind of mock commiſſion into Africa, to perſuade the parties to an accommodation. The commiſſioners found Jugurtha untractable; he told them, that he did not doubt but his conduct would be approved by the ſenate, who were well acquainted with his integrity; that, Adherbal having made an attempt upon his life, he had been obliged to raiſe troops to guard againſt the villainy of a brother, who was an aſſaſſin; and that the republic was too equitable to diſapprove of a juſt defence, which was agreeable to the laws of nations. With this anſwer he diſmiſſed the deputies, without ſuffering them to confer with Adherbal, who was ſhut up in the beſieged city [n].

Commiſſioners ſent from Rome to bring the parties to an accomodation.

As ſoon as they were gone, Jugurtha purſued the ſiege with vigor, and, following the method which he had ſeen Scipio take in Spain, encompaſſed the place with a wide ditch and a rampart, guarded with towers at proper diſtances, to keep out ſuccours and convoys. In this extremity Adherbal prevailed on two ſoldiers of the garriſon to croſs the enemy's trenches in the night, and carry a very affecting letter to Rome. When it was read in the ſenate, ſome voted for marching an army immediately againſt the uſurper. But the venal ſenators, who were moſt numerous, oppoſed this motion, and reduced the decree to this ſingle point, that a ſecond deputation ſhould be ſent to Jugurtha, conſiſting of men eminent for their probity, and venerable for their age; and that M. Scaurus, preſident of the ſenate, ſhould be at the head of it. As the affair required diſpatch, the deputies were ready to ſet out in three days; ſoon croſſed over into Africa, and landing at Utica, ſummoned Jugurtha to appear before them. The prince was thunderſtruck with this ſummons, and long in ſuſpenſe what to do. At length he reſolved to make a general aſſault upon the place, and not to appear before the Roman embaſſadors, till he had completed his conqueſt. But he did not ſucceed in his attempt, his ſoldiers being repulſed with conſiderable loſs by the Italian cohorts. In the mean time, Scaurus began to be tired with theſe delays; and, as it it was dangerous to provoke him, Jugurtha resolved to obey the summons; and, leaving his camp, came guarded by a small body of horse to plead his cause before the embassadors. Scaurus at first broke out into bitter invectives against the Numidian king, reproaching him with having basely assassinated one of his brothers, and shut up the other in his metropolis, with an intention to destroy him by famine; he ordered him to raise the siege forthwith, under pain of being declared and deemed an enemy to the senate and people of Rome, who had taken the innocent and injured Adherbal under their protection. But the anger of the Romans was soon abated. He heard Jugurtha's excuses with great composure, acquiesced in the frivolous accusations he brought against his rival, and returned home, without so much as ordering the cruel and ambitious king to raise the siege. This sudden departure made Scaurus suspected of having sacrificed the public good to his private interest; and his conduct afterwards confirmed this suspicion. Jugurtha, having got rid of the Roman embassadors, returned before Cirtha, and shut it up with more care than ever. As the famine began to be very troublesome to the garrison, the Italian troops persuaded Adherbal to capitulate, and thereby secure his life, leaving the rest to the Roman republic, which was concerned, both in honour and interest, to re-establish him in the dominions she had allotted him. Adherbal, not thinking it safe to reject the advice of armed troops, began, with the utmost reluctance to treat with his rival, and agreed to deliver up the place, on condition that he and his garrison should have their lives spared. This Jugurtha readily promised; but he no sooner entered the city, than he put all he found in arms to the sword, extended his fury even to the foreign merchants, and, to complete the scene, seized on Adherbal, and inhumanly murdered him in his own palace, after having made him suffer the most exquisite torments his cruel temper and the desire of revenge could invent. The news of this base murder soon reached Rome, where it was heard by all honest men with the utmost horror and indignation. But the friends of Jugurtha endeavoured to get the decree put off, which was ready to pass against him, in hopes that time would abate this first heat. And indeed the villainy of the Numidian king would have escaped public vengeance, had not a zealous tribune, named Caius Memmius, acquainted the people in the comitia with the heinous crimes that were laid to that prince's Cirtha surrendered.

[n] Idem ibid.

Adherbal murdered.

charge, and bitterly exclaimed againſt the venality of the ſenate. The people, convinced by their tribune, that the ſcandalous prevarication of the patricians was the effect of the money, which the emiſſaries of Jugurtha had liberally diſtributed among them, reſolved to bring the affair before their own tribunal. Hereupon the conſcript fathers, to avoid the reproach of a ſcandalous cenſure upon themſelves, decreed, that, as ſoon as the elections were over, one of the new conſuls ſhould have Numidia for his province; which was declaring, that they deſigned to make war on Jugurtha the next year [o].

The ſenate reſolve to make war upon Jugurtha.

Year after the flood, 2892. Before Chriſt, 107. Of Rome 641.

WHEN the time came for the elections, the aſſembled tribes promoted to the conſular dignity two men of very oppoſite characters, Lucius Calpurnius Piſo Beſtia and P. Cornelius Scipio Naſica. The latter poſſeſſed all the virtues of his anceſtors, had always rejected with indignation the offers of Jugurtha, and ſhewed a great deteſtation of the general corruption of the ſenate. The former was a man of great perſonal bravery, very active and vigilant, a ſtrict obſerver of military diſcipline, and conſequently fit to ſtrike terror into an enemy, and command reſpect from his own troops. But theſe valuable qualities were tarniſhed by a ſordid avarice; for he looked upon war merely as a trade, and a means to get money. So that Naſica was the more proper man to be ſent into Numidia, ſince the avarice of the generals was more to be dreaded, than the forces of the enemy. But Numidia unfortunately fell to Beſtia's lot, and Italy to Naſica's. The former began, without loſs of time, to make the neceſſary levies, and prepare for his expedition. In the mean time, Jugurtha, being informed by his emiſſaries at Rome, that a conſular army was raiſing againſt him, and that Calpurnius Beſtia was to command it, immediately diſpatched his ſon to Rome, attended by two lords of diſtinction, with orders to ſpare no expences in keeping ſteady his old protectors, and purchaſing new ones. Though his crimes had made ſuch a noiſe, that no-body could ſo much as take his part openly, yet he did not doubt, but the blow might be ſtill averted by the irreſiſtible power of money. The conſul Beſtia, who looked upon his African expedition as a glorious harveſt, heard with great concern the news of the Numidian prince's arrival in Italy. He was afraid, leſt, by his intrigues and preſents, he ſhould prevail upon the conſcript Jugurtha's ſon ſent to Rome.

[o] Salluſt. bell. Jugurth.

ſcript fathers to poſtpone the war, from which the conſul propoſed great riches. He therefore oppoſed the embaſſy with all his intereſt, and got a decree paſſed, ordering Jugurtha's ſon and his attendants to depart Italy in ten days, unleſs they were come to deliver up the king of Numidia, and all his dominions, to the republic, by way of dedition. This decree being notified to them by the conſul, they returned, without ſo much as having entered the gates of Rome [p].

But is ordered to quit Italy.

Upon their departure Beſtia haſtened his preparations. As he was not ignorant, that he might one day be called to a ſevere account for his conduct by the tribunes of the people, he had the precaution to chuſe for his council and lieutenants ſome of the moſt eminent members of the ſenate, under pretence, that he ſtood in need of perſons conſummate in the art of war and well ſkilled in negotiations. But his real deſign was, to throw upon them the odium of his future miſconduct, and ſcreen himſelf under their names and credit againſt all enquiry. Scaurus, with whoſe vices he was ſo well acquainted, though the prince of the ſenate affected to conceal the depravity of his heart, appeared to him a very proper man for his purpoſe; ſince both his extreme avarice and his weight in the ſenate were proper qualifications for it. Scaurus readily conſented to follow the conſul, promiſing himſelf great wealth from a war, which was to be carried on in a country never before entered by any Roman army. And now, all things being ready, the legions marched by land to Rhegium, there embarqued for Sicily, and from Sicily croſſed over into Africa. The conſul upon his arrival briſkly attacked Jugurtha's dominions, reduced ſeveral cities, took ſome caſtles, and made a great many priſoners. This he did in order to bring Jugurtha into his meaſures. And indeed theſe acts of hoſtility did not much affect the Numidian king. Though he was not aequainted with the conſul's character, he conceived great hopes from the preſence of Scaurus, to whoſe avarice he was no ſtranger. He therefore ſent a deputation to the conſul, deſiring a conference, and promiſing to come himſelf to the Roman camp, upon an aſſurance of ſafety for his perſon. The offer was accepted, and from that moment a ſuſpenſion of arms took place. And now, to bring the Numidian king to the conference he had deſired, and Calpurnius Beſtia ſets out for Africa.

[p] Idem ibid.

at the ſame time to ſave appearances, the conſul and Scaurus agreed to ſend the quæſtor P. Sextius to the city of Vacca, where Jugurtha reſided, under pretence of getting a certain quantity of corn, which, they ſaid, the king had promiſed in order to obtain a truce. But their real intent was, that he ſhould be an hoſtage for the king's ſafety, who, upon this proof of their ſincerity, came to the conſul's camp. A council of war was immediately aſſembled to hear his propoſals; but he there only made ſome excuſes, endeavoured to clear himſelf from the crimes laid to his charge, and dropped a few words about a dedition. The reſt was ſettled between Beſtia, Scaurus, and himſelf, in private conferences; and it is not to be doubted, but Rome was betrayed by theſe two avaricious men, ſince they granted the king more advantageous terms, than could reaſonably have been expected. They only obliged him to give the republic a certain number of horſes and cattle, thirty elephants, and a very inconſiderable ſum of money. Upon theſe terms they made a ſolemn treaty of friendſhip, with one who had baſely and treacherouſly murdered two kings, uſurped their dominions, and deſpiſed the orders of the ſenate. All men therefore ſuſpected, that Jugurtha had paid the conſul and his lieutenant very dear for a peace, which was ſo little to the honour of the Roman name. However, the reſpect which the ſenators had for Scaurus, their preſident, kept them in ſuſpenſe, no one daring to propoſe the diſannulling of the treaty, till they had heard the particulars of the agreement from the conſul himſelf and from Scaurus. In the mean while, Scipio Naſica dying, and the time for the great elections approaching, Beſtia, the only ſurviving conſul, was recalled to preſide in the comitia, in which M. Minucius Rufus and Sp. Poſthumius Albinus were choſen conſuls. Numidia fell by lot to Poſthumius, and Macedon to Minucius. The latter marched againſt the Scordiſci, who, though driven back beyond the Danube, as we have related above, repaſſed that river every winter on the ice, and laid waſte the Roman provinces. The Triballi (E), a people of Lower Mœſia, and

The corruption of Beſtia and Scaurus.

(E) The country, now known by the name of Bulgaria, was inhabited by the Triballi at the time we are ſpeaking of. Strabo indeed places the Triballi in Thrace; but we have obſerved in our hiſtory of that country, that the antients extended its boundaries far beyond the river Strymon, which divided it from Macedon, and the Daci (F), of Upper Mœſia, had joined them, and together penetrated as far as Macedon, where they committed moſt dreadful devaſtations. But the conſul having attacked them among rocks and mountains, put them to flight, and obliged them to croſs the Hebrus, on the banks of which river the battle was fought. As the river was then frozen over, the enemy ventured to croſs it on the ice; but that breaking under the weight of their heavy carriages, the river ſwallowed up great numbers of them, and the reſt diſperſed; ſo that Minucius, after having ſettled all thoſe countries in peace, returned to Rome the following year, where he was honoured with a triumh [q].

The Scordiſci and Triballi defeated by Minucius.

But the people were little affected with the ſucceſs of of theſe wars in the north. Their whole attention was turned towards Numidia. The peace lately made with Jugurtha was looked upon with deteſtation at Rome. The ſenators indeed continued ſilent out of reſpect to their head; but Caius Memmius, tribune of the people, addreſſed himſelf to the comitia, and, after having bitterly inveighed againſt the ſenate, concluded his ſpeech thus: We are told, that the Numidian has yielded up to the republic himſelf, his troops, his ſtrong-holds, and his elephants. Let us convince

[q] Liv. epit. Front. ſtrat. l. ii. Vell. Patercul.

cedon, and beyond mount Hæmus, which parted it from Mœſia. Herodotus ſpeaks of Thrace as the largeſt country in the world, except the Indies; Pliny extends its frontiers to the Danube, and Appian joins it to Illyricum. And hence it is, that Stephanus reckons the Triballi among the Illyrian nations.

(F) Dacia is generally placed by geographers between the Boryſthenes and European Sarmatia to the north; Upper Hungary to the weſt; the Danube to the ſouth; and the river Pruth and the Euxine ſea to the eaſt. This vaſt country is divided by geographers into three large provinces, viz. Dacia Alpeſtris, Dacia Ripenſis, and Dacia Mediterranea. The firſt contained part of Upper Hungary, Tranſilvania, Raſcia, and the bannat of Temeſwar; the ſecond Walachia and Moldavia; and the third the greateſt part of Upper Hungary. Dio places in Dacia all the countries on both ſides of the Danube, from mount Hæmus to the mouth of that river. Pliny ſuppoſes the Daci and Getæ, who inhabited European Scythia near the Euxine ſea, to be one and the ſame nation; and adds, that the people, who were called Getæ by the Greeks, were named Daci by the Latins (1).

(1) Plin. l. vii. & l. xxii.

vince ourſelves of the truth of this aſſertion by ſummoning Jugurtha to Rome. If he has truly ſubmitted, he will obey our orders; if he does not obey, you may eaſily judge, that what they call a treaty is nothing but a colluſion between that crafty prince and our generals. His diſcourſe ſtirred up the public animoſity to the higheſt degree. As the people could know with certainty only from the mouth of Jugurtha himſelf, whether Opimius, Scaurus, or Beſtia had been corrupted with his money, the people upon this conſideration likewiſe paſſed a decree, ſummoning Jugurtha before their tribunal. The prætor Caſſius, a man of great addreſs and unſpotted probity, was thought a proper perſon to carry the decree of the people into Numidia. Accordingly, he was charged with this important commiſſion, and ſet ſail without delay for Africa, where he found the army univerſally corrupted. The inferior officers and the private men, following the example of their general, thought of nothing but acquiring riches. Some had ſold to Jugurtha the thirty elephants, which he had given to the republic; others had ſet the deſerters at liberty for money, plundered the countries of their allies, and committed every-where moſt dreadful ravages. But the prætor, without taking notice of theſe diſorders, which it was not his province to correct, applied himſelf wholly to cure Jugurtha of his ſuſpicions, and to perſuade him to come to Rome. The Numidian, after a long ſtruggle with himſelf, reſolved at length to comply with the order of the Roman people, having for his ſafeguard the public faith, and, what he chiefly relied on, the word of Caſſius. A great honour indeed to the Roman people to ſee the powerful and warlike king of Numidia come to Rome, in compliance with their ſummons, and by that act of obedience acknowledge their ſovereignty. The king, to raiſe compaſſion, entered the city without any pomp or attendance, and dreſſed in a very negligent manner. He was no ſooner arrived, than he had recourſe to his uſual weapons, money. He knew, that the ſecuring of one of the tribunes was ſufficient to put a ſtop to all proceedings before the aſſembly of the people. He therefore, without loſs of time, gained with a large ſum one of the ten, named Caius Bæbius Salca, a man of great boldneſs and unbounded avarice. Having ſecured this point, he preſented himſelf before the people aſſembled, when the tribune Memmius reproached him with his ingratitude to the family of Micipſa, his cruelty, his exceſſive ambition, the murder of his two adopted brothers, his diſobedience

Jugurtha ſummoned before the people.

Comes to Rome.

Gains over one of the tribunes.

bedience to the orders of the ſenate, and his private intelligence with thoſe whom the ſenate had commiſſioned to carry them, which, he ſaid, was highly criminal and odious to the republic. The zealous tribune ended his ſpeech with theſe words: You would never have carried your audaciouſneſs to ſo great a height, if you had not been ſupported by a Roman faction, which you have purchaſed with money. We know them all; their zeal for ſupporting you in your iniquity has betrayed them. But it concerns us to have their names from your mouth. You may hope for all favour from the faith and clemency of the Romans, if you honeſtly declare to us, without any evaſions, the perſons whoſe protection you have purchaſed. But if you conceal, or diſguiſe, the truth, you are irrecoverably loſt. Speak, Jugurtha, ſpeak, and anſwer the expectations of the Roman people. While Jugurtha was preparing to reply, Bæbius, the mercenary tribune, whom the king had purchaſed, ſtood up, and with an imperious tone, Though they preſs you to ſpeak, Jugurtha, ſaid he, I enjoin you ſilence. This unexpected oppoſition raiſed ſuch murmurs and clamours, as would have confounded a man of leſs impudence and intrepidity than Bæbius. But he obſtinately perſiſted in his oppoſition; ſo that the people, betrayed by one of their own magiſtrates, were forced to break up the aſſembly, without having received the leaſt information. Jugurtha, having thus eſcaped the judgment of the people with impunity, carried his villainy to an exceſs ſcarce to be imagined. We have obſerved above, that Guluſſa, brother to Micipſa, left an illegitimate ſon, named Maſſiva. This prince had eſpouſed the cauſe of Adherbal, as the moſt juſt; but, after the taking of Cirtha and the cruel death of the king his relation, he had fled for refuge to Rome, where the few men of honour, whom Jugurtha could not corrupt, encouraged him to demand of the ſenate and people the crown of his anceſtors, which Jugurtha had forfeited by the many crimes he had committed. The conſul Poſthumius Albinus, to whoſe lot Numidia was now fallen, was his avowed friend and moſt zealous protector. At his motion the people were ſtrongly inclined to beſtow the crown of Numidia on this prince, who, though he had not been adopted by Micipſa, was of the blood-royal, and grandſon to Maſiniſſa. But Jugurtha, to defeat at once all the deſigns of his enemies, cauſed Maſſiva to be aſſaſſinated, in Rome itſelf and in the face of the republic. The wretch who executed the villainy was inſtantly ſeized,

He eſcapes with impunity.

Cauſes Maſſiva to be aſſaſſinated.

and

and brought before the prætor, to whom he confeſſed, that he had been hired by Bomilcar, one of the king's attendants, to commit the murder. Hereupon Bomilcar was cited to appear before the prætor; but Jugurtha found means to convey him privately out of Rome, and ſend him back into Africa. Upon the ſudden diſappearing of Bomilcar, all the odium of the baſe aſſaſſination fell upon Jugurtha. But, as the treating him like a criminal was contrary to the promiſe made him, he was ordered by the ſenate to quit Rome immediately; which he did, without taking leave of the conſcript fathers, and, for fear of being ſtopped, made all poſſible haſte to embarque at the neareſt port. As he was on the road, he looked back on the city, and cried out, O mercenary city, thou wouldſt even ſell thyſelf, if thou couldſt find a man rich enough to purchaſe thee. He was no ſooner gone, than the ſenate by a ſpecial decree diſannulled the infamous peace which Beſtia had made with him; and then Poſthumius Albinus, having raiſed with all poſſible expedition the neceſſary troops, croſſed over into Africa, flattering himſelf, that he ſhould be able to put an end to the war, before the year of his conſulate expired; though it was already far advanced. But the artful Numidian found means to amuſe him, at one time pretending to be ready to ſurrender himſelf up to the Romans, at another declaring, that he would ſooner part with his life than his crown. When the conſul began to puſh on the war with vigor, he ſent deputies to treat of peace, and promiſed to ſubmit to all that was demanded of him; but when he was preſſed to perform his promiſe, he found out a thouſand pretences to put off the execution of the articles which he had agreed to. Thus by one evaſion or other, he gained time, which he improved to the beſt advantage in the regulation of his affairs. And now, the conſular year being ready to expire, Poſthumius was obliged to return to Rome to preſide in the comitia for the new elections; ſo that he left Africa without having concluded any thing, either by action or treaty. Upon his arrival at Rome, he was loaded with the curſes of the people, and ſtrongly ſuſpected of having betrayed his country, as his predeceſſors had done. No-body believed, that the Numidian could have found means, by artifices alone and without any connivance in the general, to ſuſpend the motions of a large army, which Rome maintained in Africa at a vaſt expence [r].

Is ordered to quit Rome.

THE

[r] Idem ibid.

THE conſul on his return found great diſturbances in Rome, occaſioned by ſome tribunes of the people. Licinius Craſſus had paſſed a law againſt luxury and expenſive tables, and C. Manilius another for erecting a tribunal to try thoſe whom Jugurtha had corrupted. The law publiſhed by Licinius was in ſubſtance this; that on the days of the calends, nones, markets, and great games, any one might lay out on his table thirty aſſes, that is, 1 s. 11 d. but that on other days no man ſhould have more than three pounds of freſh meat, and one of ſalt, at a meal; but as to pulſe, herbs, and fruit, every one might have what quantity of them he pleaſed. This, though a ſevere edict, met with ſo ready a compliance from the citizens, that they put it in execution, even before it was confirmed by the people. Upon the merit of this law, Licinius endeavoured to get himſelf continued in his office; as did alſo his collegue Manilius. But this ended only in protracting the elections, which at laſt came on, when Q. Cæcilius Metellus and M. Junius Silanus were choſen conſuls. During their adminiſtration, the commiſſioners, appointed to try thoſe who had been corrupted by Jugurtha, purſuant to the law paſſed at the motion of Manilius, ended their enquiries, after they had been two years in that commiſſion. Scaurus, prince of the ſenate and the moſt guilty among them, was artful enough to get himſelf nominated at the head of the commiſſion, which he diſcharged with the utmoſt ſeverity, puniſhing many, who were leſs criminal than himſelf. He condemned to baniſhment ſeveral conſular men, and even one pontifex, a thing never heard of before. He did not even ſpare his accomplice Lucius Calpurnius Beſtia, but baniſhed him with the late conſul Sp. Poſthumius Albinus, and the famous proſecutor of the Gracchi, L. Opimius, who died of want at Dyrrachium. Cicero never mentions the baniſhment of Opimius, but with indignation. To the ſhame of the Romans, ſays he, this great man, who had juſt ſaved his country from the fury of the Gracchi, could not find a quiet retreat for his old age in the city he had preſerved. Rome proclaims the importance of his ſervices by a famous monument erected to his memory in the forum; and yet forces him to ſeek a ſepulchre in a foreign country [s]. Thus Scaurus, who had been himſelf moſt ſcandalouſly bribed by Jugurtha, not only eſcaped puniſhment, but judged and puniſhed others for having ſuffered themſelves to be bribed.

The Licinian law againſt luxury.

Several ſenators and conſulars baniſhed.

THE

[s] Cic. pro Sextio. pro Planco, & in Piſon.

THE new conſuls having drawn lots, Narbonne Gaul fell to Silanus, who marched againſt the Cimbri and Teutones; but his army was routed at the firſt onſet, and, in conſequence of this defeat, all Narbonne Gaul expoſed at once to the ravages of thoſe barbarians. Rome only continued miſtreſs of thoſe cities, which the Cimbri could not take for want of ſkill in carrying on ſieges [t]. As for Metellus, it fell to his lot to make war in Numidia, where he was attended with better ſucceſs. Jugurtha had gained a conſiderable advantage over the Roman army, after the departure of the late conſul Poſthumius Albinus. That general, before he left Africa, had given the command of the army to his brother Aulus Poſthumius, whoſe only qualification was his being the conſul's brother. He no ſooner ſaw himſelf at the head of forty thouſand men, than he reſolved to take advantage of the conſul's abſence, in order to gain himſelf both riches and glory. Though the troops were in winter-quarters, and the month of January was a very improper time for military expeditions, he aſſembled all his forces, marched into the field, and, through roads almoſt impaſſable, brought them before Suthul, a ſtrong hold in Numidia, where the king's treaſures were lodged. This was the lure that drew him; but the caſtle ſtood upon the brow of a hill, and was ſurrounded by marſhes, which in the winter made it altogether inacceſſible. However, Aulus, blinded by his avarice, ventured to beſiege it. Jugurtha, overjoyed to ſee him loſe his time and tire his troops, in ſo difficult an undertaking, cauſed ſeveral propoſals to be made to him, as if he dreaded the ſucceſs of his arms. To keep up his preſumption, he ſent deputies from time to time to beg peace, in as ſubmiſſive terms, as if he had been under the greateſt apprehenſions. He did not, however, neglect to advance with his army, as if he intended to throw ſuccours into the place. As he drew near Suthul, he pretended to be terrified at the ſight of the Roman forces, and in order to encreaſe the confidence of the general, he retired from poſt to poſt through difficult roads. Aulus, quitting Suthul, purſued him cloſe, leſt he ſhould find means to make his eſcape. But the crafty Numidian, who was well acquainted with the country, drew him inſenſibly into narrow paſſes, and then returned to his uſual artifices. He held the general in ſo great contempt, that he did not think it worth his while to bribe him: but he applied Aulus Poſthumius beſieges Suthul.

[t] Liv. epit. l. lxviii. Eutrop. Oroſ.

plied himself to the officers and soldiers of the army, and gained over, by his emissaries, not only two cohorts of Thracians and one of Ligurians, but many of the legionaries themselves, who basely agreed to sacrifice the good of their country, and the lives of their fellow-citizens, to their private interest. As Jugurtha's camp was not far from that of the Romans, the king ordered his light-armed Numidians to mount the enemy's ramparts in the dead of the night; which they did with inconceivable swiftness, and filled the camp with terror and confusion. In the mean time, the chief officer of the third legion, pursuant to his agreement with Jugurtha, opened to him two gates of the camp, and, being joined by the Ligurian and Thracian cohorts, covered the Numidian army as they entered. The Romans with their general abandoned the camp, and fled in the utmost confusion. The slaughter was not great, the darkness of the night favouring the retreat of the fugitives; they fled through the two other gates of the camp, and, taking different roads, gained a neighbouring eminence, and posted themselves there. When it was day, Aulus found scarce any of his men wanting, except those who had sold themselves to the enemy; but the greatest part of them had thrown away their arms, that they might fly with more expedition.

Jugurtha takes the Roman camp.

EARLY next morning, Jugurtha surrounded the hill, on which the Romans were posted; and then Aulus, seeing himself besieged by a victorious army, sent a shameful deputation to Jugurtha, demanding quarter only, and offering a lasting peace, which he would undertake to get ratified by the senate and people. The Numidian answered, that he would grant the Romans life and liberty, upon condition, that they should all pass under the yoke, and quit Numidia in ten days. To this the timorous general submitted, and marched with all his army between two posts set up for that purpose, amidst the taunts and shouts of the Numidian soldiers. The Roman troops, thus disgraced, disbanded themselves, and retired into the African province, that is, the antient dominions of Carthage, which were now possessed by the republic. The senate was no sooner informed of this shameful peace, than they declared it void, and recalled Aulus, who was soon after tried by Scaurus, and condemned to banishment. Metellus, to whose lot Numidia was fallen, as we have related above, hastened the necessary preparations for carrying on the war with the utmost vigor. He was a senator of great virtue

The Roman army passes under the yoke.

and Metellus ſent into Numidia.

and integrity, and, beſides, had given proofs of uncommon valour and prudence in the command of armies; ſo that all things ſeemed to promiſe ſucceſs to his enterpriſe. The Romans, fully perſuaded that it would not be in Jugurtha's power to corrupt him with offers, readily decreed him the recruits he deſired, and at his requeſt even diſannulled ſome laws which reduced the pay of the legionaries. In ſhort the people refuſed him nothing which he thought neceſſary for the carrying on of the war, and wiping off one of the moſt ſhameful reproaches, that had ever been caſt on the Roman name, ſince the diſgrace of the Caudine Forks. As for Metellus himſelf, his chief concern was, to chuſe ſuch ſubalterns as he could confide in, and whoſe ſkill in the art of war had been already proved. Among theſe was the famous Marius, who, as he had neither birth, fortune, nor eloquence ſufficient to raiſe him to the firſt dignities, had continued quite idle at Rome, ever ſince his prætor-

Marius lieutenant to Metellus.

ſhip. He therefore joyfully accepted the offer Metellus made him, of being one of his lieutenant-generals. When all things were ready, the conſul ſet out without delay, and, landing in Africa, ſpent the whole ſummer in diſciplining his troops, which lived diſperſed about the province in the utmoſt diſorder, declaring, that he would not ſuffer them to engage, till they had learnt how to conquer. And now Jugurtha, finding he had to deal with a general, whom he could neither over-reach nor bribe, ſent an embaſſy to him, with all poſſible marks of a ſincere ſubmiſſion, begging only quarter for himſelf and children. But Metellus, ſuſpecting the Numidian of double dealing, oppoſed artifice with artifice. He took each of the embaſſadors aſide, and prevailed upon them to promiſe, that they would deliver up to him the uſurper, dead or alive. But this project being diſconcerted by the circumſpection, vigilance, and ſuſpicions of the king, the conſul reſolved to attack him with open force. Accordingly, he entered Numidia, and, tho' no enemy appeared, he kept conſtantly upon his guard againſt a ſurpriſe. His troops always marched in order of battle. Metellus himſelf led on the advanced guard at the head of the archers, ſlingers, and light-armed troops; Marius commanded the cavalry of the legions in the rear, and Rutilius, another of Metellus's lieutenants, the foot in the centre. In this fine order the conſular army appeared before Vacca, a trading city full of Italian merchants, which upon the firſt ſummons received a Roman garriſon. From Vacca the conſul ſtill kept advancing, in the ſame order, towards towards the heart of Numidia. In the mean time, Jugurtha, having drawn together all the troops he could, lay in ambuſh for the Romans, waiting to engage them as they ſhould come down from a mountain, which ſtood directly in the conſul's road. Metellus no ſooner reached the top of the mountain, than he diſcovered men and horſes concealed among the buſhes, which were not thick enough to cover them; and being fully ſatisfied, as he drew nearer, that the enemy was in ambuſh there, he changed both the rout and diſpoſition of the army. In the firſt place, he ordered Rutilius to march down the hill another way, and pitch a camp on the banks of the Muthullus, about twenty thouſand paces from the hill. This was a wiſe precaution to ſecure water for his troops in that dry and burning climate. As he was reſolved to leave the hill on his right-hand, he altered the diſpoſition of his troops, and made his right wing three times as ſtrong as uſual, knowing it would be moſt expoſed to the enemy. In the centre he placed his infantry, intermixed with ſome manipuli of light-armed troops, and ordered his cavalry to cover the army in the flanks. In this order he marched down the ſteepeſt part of the hill, and advanced ſlowly towards the plain. Marius commanded in the centre; and Metellus himſelf in the right wing, which muſt naturally be firſt attacked. As ſoon as the conſular troops had got below the top of the hill, Jugurtha began to move, and, having ordered two thouſand men to take poſſeſſion of the top of the mountain, which the Romans had quitted, he ſounded the charge. The Romans faced about, but could not bring the Numidians to a cloſe engagement. As they had got above the conſular troops, they diſcharged ſhowers of darts upon them, and wounded them at a great diſtance. If they were purſued by the Roman cavalry, they diſperſed and fled ſingly, entering the coppices, whither the enemy durſt not purſue them. They then rallied, and, ſallying out again, fell unexpectedly on the conſular army in different quarters. Never was a more extraordinary battle fought; they all engaged in ſmall parties, every one attacking the enemy, or defending himſelf as occaſion offered, without any rule or order. The day was far advanced, before it could be known which ſide had the advantage. Both armies were equally tired and exhauſted with heat and fatigue; and many had fallen on both ſides in the ſeveral attacks, which had ſucceeded one another, without intermiſſion, from morning to night. At length the Numidians, towards the cloſe of the day being briſkly attacked by the Roman legionaries, and purſued from poſt to poſt, diſperſed, and no more appeared [u].

Vacca taken by Metellus.

Jugurtha defeated by Metellus.

WHILE Metellus was thus engaged on the mountain, Rutilius, who had been ſent by the conſul to pitch a camp on the banks of the Muthullus, was vigorouſly attacked by Bomilcar, one of the king's generals. But that brave Roman repulſed the enemy with great ſlaughter, and having purſued them, took four of their elephants, and killed the reſt to the number of forty; ſo that the conſul gained two victories on one day. Metellus continued his march all night, and arrived before day-break with all his troops at the camp on the Muthullus, which he found finiſhed. There he reſted four days, to refreſh his men and have their wounds dreſſed. In this camp he received intelligence, that the Numidian, being abandoned by his army, had retired to a diſtant place, covered with woods and rocks, and was forming a new one. Deſertion was no crime amongſt the Numidians, who, after the firſt defeat, were at liberty to return home, or continue in the army, as they pleaſed. However, the Roman general did not think it adviſeable to follow the fugitive king, but contented himſelf with ſending out parties to plunder the country. On the other hand, Jugurtha behaved with the addreſs and ability of a great commander. He ſeemed to be in all places, appeared, when leaſt expected, at the head of a flying army, and falling upon the Romans diſperſed about the fields, cut great numbers of them in pieces, and then retired to the mountains and foreſts. In the mean time, news being brought to Rome of the victory gained by Metellus and his lieutenant Rutilius, the temples were opened, and ſupplications made by way of thankſgiving to the gods, for the ſucceſs which had attended the arms of the republic in Numidia. The probity, diſintereſtedneſs, valour, and wiſdom of Metellus were in the mouth of every Roman [w].

IN the mean time, Rome raiſed Ser. Sulpicius Galba and Q. Hortenſius to the conſulate. But the latter, who was father to Q. Hortenſius, Cicero's rival in eloquence, either declined the burden of the office, or was prevented by death from enjoying that dignity; it being certain, that another was ſoon after choſen in his room, viz. M. Aurelius

[u] Salluſt. bell. Jugurth. & Plut. in Mario. [w] Salluſt. ibid. Flor. l. iii.

lius Scaurus [x]. At the ſame time Metellus was continued general of the Roman army in Numidia, with the title of proconſul. As for the new conſuls, Italy fell by lot to Galba, and Narbonne Gaul to Scaurus, whither he repaired to make war upon the Cimbri, who had reduced almoſt that whole province. But to return to Numidia: Marius, whoſe ambition was awaked by the applauſes Rome had given his general, was now become his rival, narrowly watched all his ſteps, and laid hold of every opportunity that offered to defame him. We are told by Plutarch, that Marius carried his ingratitude ſo far, as to boaſt, that he was not ſo much indebted to Metellus, as to fortune, which had led him into Africa, as to a great ſtage, where he ſhould, in the end, diſplay thoſe talents with which nature had liberally endowed him. And indeed the point he had now in view was, to raiſe himſelf at the expence of his general and benefactor. He was impatient of getting the conſulſhip, that he might put an end to the Numidian war, and be honoured with a triumph. His pretenſions were ſupported by all thoſe qualifications which are requiſite in a great commander. For he was famous for an heroic valour, a great love of diſcipline, a ſtrange aſcendant over the ſoldiers, a temperance carried to the ſevereſt abſtinence, great intrepidity in ſudden dangers, an uncommon coolneſs and preſence of mind in battle, and an extraordinary readineſs at expedients after bad ſucceſs. But as for thoſe virtues and diſpoſitions of mind, which form the character of an honeſt man, Marius was quite deſtitute of them. Honeſty and ingratitude are incompatible. Metellus, who ſaw into the deſigns of his lieutenant, began to be jealous of him, and to fear leaſt he ſhould be ſupplanted by him at the end of the year. He therefore took great care not to give any advantage to his malicious rival by ill conduct. He took care to have his convoys ſtrongly guarded, and always ſent out his whole cavalry together, ordering them not only to pillage the country, but to deſtroy whole towns with fire and ſword. The Numidian, ſeeing his country utterly ruined by this new way of making war, at laſt left his faſtneſſes, and followed the Romans, being always intent both on ſurpriſing and avoiding the enemy. He burnt up the forage, and poiſoned the waters in all places, where the legions were to paſs. He was every moment haraſſing either Metellus or Marius, and as ſoon as he

The ingratitude of Marius to Metellus.

[x] Faſt. Capitol.

he had attacked them vigorouſly in the rear, he immediately regained the mountains. Metellus, finding he could not draw Jugurtha to a battle, reſolved, if poſſible, to force him to it. In order to this, he reſolved to beſiege Zama; but Jugurtha, upon the firſt notice of his deſign, flew thither, got to the place before him, and placed a ſtrong garriſon in it of Roman deſerters, on whom he could depend. Then he haſtened to Sicca, whither the proconſul had detached Marius for proviſions. He was very deſirous of entering the liſts with that commander, who had been his intimate friend, and had learnt the military art with him under Scipio, at the famous ſiege of Numantia. He arrived juſt as Marius was marching out of the city with his convoy, and fell upon him with a fury not to be expreſſed. But the Roman repulſed him, and, though ſurpriſed, behaved with ſuch preſence of mind and intrepidity, as made him ever after dread the very name of Marius: When the convoys came up, Metellus inveſted Zama, and made a general aſſault upon the place: but the beſieged repulſed the aggreſſors, and diſcharged ſuch ſhowers of darts, ſtones, and fire-brands upon them, that they were obliged to retire in the utmoſt confuſion. During the heat of the action, Jugurtha appeared on a ſudden, and as moſt of the legionaries, left to guard the Roman camp, were gone out to ſee the attack, he made himſelf maſter of one of the gates. Hereupon ſome of the Romans, who guarded the tents, ran to their arms, others betook themſelves to flight; but a ſmall body of forty men only, poſting themſelves on an eminence within the camp, defended it with ſurpriſing valour, till Marius came to their relief. For Metellus no ſooner heard, that the king had ſurprized his camp, than he detached that brave commander with all the cavalry to drive him out. Marius flew with joy to a ſecond engagement with the Numidian, forced his way into the camp, and obliged the king to fly out of one of the gates, and ſhelter himſelf among the rocks. As for Metellus, after a vain attempt upon the town, he retired to paſs the night in his camp. The next day he renewed the attack, but with no better ſucceſs, the beſieged, who were all Roman deſerters, repulſing the aggreſſors with unparalleled bravery. During the aſſault, Jugurtha appeared anew, but, after a ſharp conflict, was put to flight by the cavalry, which Metellus had poſted with ſome manipuli on the road the king had taken the day before. In the mean time, night coming on, the proconſul returned to his camp; camp; and, as the ſeaſon was far advanced and the garriſon made a reſolute defence, he thought it adviſeable to raiſe the ſiege, and put his troops into winter quarters in the Roman province [y].

Metellus reſolves to beſiege Zama.

Jugurtha defeated by Marius.

The ſiege of Zama raiſed.

As Metellus did not doubt, but he ſhould be continued in the command of the army till all Numidia was reduced, he employed his time in making the neceſſary preparations for the next campaign. He found means to have a private interview with Bomilcar, who, as we have related above, had been the chief agent in the murder of Maſſiva. Bomilcar was greatly attached to Jugurtha; but, as he was a Numidian, Metellus did not deſpair of prevailing upon him to betray his maſter. He therefore not only promiſed him impunity, but aſſured him of the protection of the republic, in caſe he ſhould either diſpatch Jugurtha, or deliver him up alive into his hands. The Numidian hearkened to the proconſul's offers, and treacherouſly perſuaded Jugurtha, that it was abſolutely neceſſary for him to ſurrender himſelf up to the Romans without reſerve: Prevent, ſaid he, the fatal deſigns which your own ſubjects may have on your life. Have recourſe to the Roman clemency, and depend on the ſincerity of their offers. Metellus has even more honour than bravery. The king, not ſuſpecting any treachery, was eaſily prevailed upon to diſpatch an embaſſy to the proconſul, acquainting him, that he was ready to ſubmit to ſuch conditions as he ſhould think fit to impoſe upon him. Upon this Metellus, having aſſembled from all the places, where the army was quartered, ſuch officers as were of ſenatorial families, held a great council of war, in which it was agreed, that the king of Numidia ſhould, by way of preliminary, ſend the Romans two hundred thouſand pounds weight of ſilver, with all his elephants, and a certain number of horſes and arms, and deliver up all the deſerters. The king complied with theſe hard conditions, and immediately ordered all the deſerters, to the number of about three thouſand, moſtly Thracians or Ligurians, to be ſeized and ſent to the proconſul, by whoſe orders ſome had their hands cut off, others were ſet in the ground up to their waiſts, and ſhot to death by the Roman archers, and the reſt burnt alive [z]. The other two articles were likewiſe executed with great punctuality; the elephants, horſes, and arms, required by the proconſul, Jugurtha delivers up his elephants, money, arms, &c.

[y] Salluſt ibid. Plut. in Mario. Oroſ. l. v. c. 3. [z] Oroſ. l. 5. c. 3.

were delivered up, and the money paid down. And now the king, having ſtripped himſelf of his money, his elephants, his horſes, and his deſerters, in whom conſiſted the main ſtrength of his army, the proconſul ordered him to repair in perſon to Tiſidium, a city in Numidia, there to receive further directions. He ſtarted at this laſt ſtep, began to heſitate, and ſpent ſeveral days, without being able to come to any reſolution. The remembrance of his enormous crimes ſtung him with freſh remorſe; he dreaded the ſevere puniſhment, which his guilty conſcience repreſented to him, in a very ſtrong light, as due for ſo many murders; the charms of a crown, and the horror of falling from a throne into ſlavery, made ſo deep an impreſſion upon his mind, that he reſolved, at all adventures, to try once more the fate of war. A ſceptre, ſaid he, is not ſo heavy as chains. To arms! to arms! let us renew the war. It is better to periſh at the head of an army, than to fall at once from empire to ſlavery. And from this time he never ſhewed the leaſt inclination to peace. He was now wholly intent on raiſing a new army, on fortifying the places which continued faithful to him, on providing arms, and endeavouring to ſurpriſe thoſe cities which had ſurrendered to the Romans. Vacca was an important poſt, of which Metellus had made himſelf maſter ſoon after his arrival in Africa, as we have related above, and given the government of it to Turpilius Silanus, a citizen of Collatia, a man of known equity and moderation, and his intimate friend. Turpilius, quite free from all pride and avarice, gained the affections of the inhabitants by the mildneſs of his government; but their averſion to a foreign yoke prevailed over the eſteem they had for their governor. The chief men of the city ſuffered themſelves to be gained over to the intereſt of Jugurtha, and plotted among themſelves the maſſacring of the Roman garriſon. To compaſs their treacherous deſign, they took the opportunity of a public feſtival to invite the officers to feaſt at their houſes; and, when they had eat and drank plentifully, every man, as had been agreed on before-hand, ſtabbed his gueſt. Such as got into the ſtreets, were overwhelmed and killed with ſtones from the tops of the houſes; ſo that Turpilius was the only man who eſcaped the common maſſacre. The proconſul no ſooner heard of the revolution in Vacca, than he ordered the legion, which was quartered r[illegible]im, to arms, and, joining with them a great number o[illegible]oſe Numidians who had ſubmitted to Rome, marched in perſon to avenge avenge the blood of his Romans. The inhabitants had ſhut their gates for fear of a ſurprize; but when they ſaw from their ramparts a body of Numidian cavalry advancing towards their city, without committing any devaſtations, they concluded, that Jugurtha muſt be at the head of them, and upon this preſumption marched out to meet him. But their miſtake proved fatal to them: the Numidian cavalry fell upon the diſarmed multitude, and cut them in pieces; and, in the mean time, the Roman legion coming up ſeized the gates of the city, retook, and plundered it. Thus the treacherous inhabitants of Vacca, after having enjoyed their liberty but two days, were brought again under ſubjection, and treated with the utmoſt ſeverity. Tho' Metellus was fully convinced, that Turpilius was no-ways guilty, he was obliged, by the clamours of the army, contrary to his own inclination, to have him tried by a council of war. Marius, who was one of his judges, merely out of ſpite to Metellus, became his accuſer. He charged him with having ſold the town and the lives of the Romans under his command, laid great ſtreſs on the diſtinction ſhewn him in having his life alone ſpared, and proſecuted the affair ſo warmly, that he got him condemned to be firſt beaten with rods, and then beheaded. Soon after the execution of the ſentence, the innocence of Turpilius plainly appeared; and then the other officers made their apologies to the proconſul for the ſentence they had pronounced, and bewailed with him the unfortunate end of a man, whom he had judged worthy of his friendſhip; but Marius publicly rejoiced at the death of the innocent Turpilius, and had even the inſolence to boaſt, that he had found means to torment Metellus with a perpetual remorſe and an avenging fury, which would be continually requiring of him the innocent blood of his friend [a].

But afterwards reſolves to purſue the war.

The Romans maſſacred in Vacca.

Vacca retaken.

Marius's inſolent conduct.

AND now, upon the news that the ſenate and people were inclined to continue Metellus in the command of the army, till the war with Jugurtha was ended, Marius's hatred to his general broke out into open attacks upon him. He began with decrying and calumniating him among the ſoldiery; he repreſented him as an ambitious man, who prolonged the war, only to keep himſelf the longer in power and command; he pretended, that the natural ſloth and timorouſneſs of Metellus, which were encreaſed by age, made him incapable of oppoſing an active and vigilant enemy; he bragged among the common ſoldiers, with whom he made himſelf very familiar, that, with half the troops Metellus had in his army, he would undertake, in one ſingle campaign, to bring Jugurtha to Rome dead or alive. Whatever Marius ſaid, the ſoldiers wrote to their relations and friends at Rome; and theſe letters, being communicated from houſe to houſe, prejudiced the people againſt Metellus, and at the ſame time raiſed the reputation of his lieutenant, who, not content with adviſing the ſoldiers to ſend bad accounts of their general to Rome, went ſo far as openly to beg the votes of the Roman merchants of Utica, for chuſing him conſul at the next election, in order thereby to enable him to ſupplant his general and benefactor. He alſo prevailed on Gauda the brother of Jugurtha, but by a different mother, whom Metellus had diſobliged (G), to write to the ſenate againſt the proconſul, and much in his favour. Theſe ſolicitations proved very advantageous to Marius, who being informed by his emiſſaries at Rome, of the favourable inclination of the people towards him, publicly deſired leave of the proconſul to return to Rome, to make intereſt for the conſulate. Metellus, tho' a man of great honour and probity, was not quite free from that pride, which Marius aſks leave to return to Rome.

He defames his general.

[a] Salluſt. Plut. ibid.

(G) Metellus had not treated this prince with that honour and reſpect which he expected. When he firſt came to the Roman camp, he deſired two marks of diſtinction, viz. that in all public aſſemblies he ſhould be placed at the general's right-hand; and that a troop of Roman horſe ſhould be aſſigned him for his guard. Metellus refuſed him both; the firſt, becauſe it was a mark of diſtinction, which the Romans ſhewed to thoſe only whom they acknowledged to be kings; and the ſecond, becauſe he thought it an affront to the Roman knights, to make them in a manner Numidian guards. Marius therefore, applying himſelf to the young prince, in the heat of his reſentment, endeavoured to exaſperate him againſt the proud proconſul, whom he repreſented as taking delight in ſeeing the ſons of kings groveling at his feet. He likewiſe aſſured him, that, if he was general, he would treat him with all the reſpect due to his character, and ſoon place him on the throne of his anceſtors, as the next heir to the crown. By theſe diſcourſes Marius eaſily attached Gauda to himſelf; and the Numidian wrote to the republic, in terms of great bitterneſs, againſt the proconſul, and as much to the advantage of the lieutenant (2).

(2) Salluſt. bell. Jugurth.

which is almoſt inſeparable from noble birth. He therefore received this application with haughtineſs, and anſwered Marius with a kind of raillery; It will be ſoon enough for you, Marius, to ſtand for the conſulate, when my ſon ſhall be old enough to be your collegue. Young Metellus was then ſcarce twenty years of age; whereas a man was to be at leaſt forty before he could be choſen conſul. In ſhort, the proconſul told his lieutenant in plain terms, that he would not give him his diſcharge, ſo long as he had any occaſion for his ſervice. At the ſame time he applied again to Bomilcar, putting him in mind of the promiſe he had made of delivering up Jugurtha to him dead or alive; but Bomilcar, who had been ſuſpected by the king ever ſince he adviſed him to ſurrender, applied to Nabdalſa, a Numidian lord of diſtinction, and one of the greateſt favourites the king had. He communicated to him his deſign of ſacrificing the king to the welfare of his country. Nabdalſa, who was one of the moſt wealthy lords of Numidia, readily entered into the plot, which would ſecure his great eſtate, and both his own life and the lives of his children. The two traitors agreed to ſurpriſe their king, and carry him to the proconſul; the time was fixed for the execution of the deſign, and the ambuſh prepared. On the day appointed, Bomilcar came to the place agreed on; and if Nabdalſa had performed his part, an end had been put at once to the Numidian war; but Nabdalſa not appearing, Bomilcar wrote a letter to him, putting him in mind of his promiſe, and repreſenting to him, that the affairs of Jugurtha were deſperate; that he muſt ſoon periſh, either by their hands, or the hands of the Romans; that it was not worth their whiles to ſacrifice their eſtates, their liberty, the lives of their wives and children, for an uſurper and aſſaſſin; that, by delivering him up to the Romans, they would ſave their country from impending ruin, ſecure their lives and eſtates, and gain the favour of the powerful republic, &c. This letter was delivered ſafe into Nabdalſa's hands, while he was lying on a couch, reſting himſelf after a violent exerciſe. After he had read it, he laid it on his pillow, and, muſing upon the contents of it, fell aſleep. In the mean time, his ſecretary coming into the room, and finding a letter open, read it, in order to anſwer it; but, being ſhocked at the propoſals of Bomilcar, he went immediately to acquaint the king with the plot. Nabdalſa ſoon after awaked, miſſed the letter, and finding, upon enquiry, that his ſecretary alone had been in his room,

A conſpiracy againſt Jugurtha.

and

and had ſuddenly diſappeared, he diſpatched without delay ſome of his attendants after him; but, as he had got the ſtart of them, the letter was already in the king's hands. Hereupon Nabdalſa flew to court, and aſſured the king, that he would have diſcovered the plot, if his treacherous ſervant had not prevented him. Jugurtha, for fear of raiſing a ſedition, for Nabdalſa was greatly beloved by the ſoldiery, ſeemed to be ſatisfied with the excuſe; but condemned Bomilcar and moſt of his accomplices to die [b]. The loſs of Bomilcar fruſtrated the hopes of Metellus, who thereupon reſolved to take the field. As he was now quite tired with the importunities of Marius, he gave him at length leave to go to Rome, but only twelve days before the election. Ambition gave Marius wings; for he reached the city in ſix days after his ſetting out, and there made the beſt uſe of the little time he had left to gain the favour of the people. He calumniated the proconſul, accuſed him of timorouſneſs, aſſured the people, that, as he was well acquainted with the country, and, without all doubt, more vigorous and active than Metellus, he would, with half the troops the proconſul commanded, in one campaign, take Jugurtha dead or alive; in ſhort, he omitted nothing, that could either diſcredit his general, or gain himſelf a great reputation. As the nobility had of late conſtantly choſen two patricians to the conſulate, contrary to the antient law, that one of the conſuls ſhould be a patrician, and the other a plebeian, the people were highly diſpleaſed with the patricians in general, and wholly bent on promoting Marius, who bore an irreconcileable hatred to the nobility. All the mob of Rome crouded to his houſe, the artificers left their ſhops to attend him, and nothing was heard in the comitia, but the praiſes of Marius and invectives againſt Metellus. In ſhort, he was raiſed to the conſulate by a great majority, with L. Caſſius Longinus. His next buſineſs was to ſupplant his benefactor, and get himſelf nominated to ſucceed him in the command of the army in Numidia. The ſenate had already, by a ſpecial decree, appointed Metellus to be proconſul in Numidia for the third year; but Marius applied to the people by their tribune Manilius Mancinus, and at his motion they determined, that Marius alone ſhould carry on the war with Jugurtha. His collegue had Narbonne Gaul for his province, where he fell into an ambuſh laid for him

The conſpiracy diſcovered, and Bomilcar executed.

Marius obtains leave to go to Rome.

Where he is choſen conſul, and appointed to ſucceed Metellus.

[b] Salluſt. Plut. Vel. Paterc. ibid.

him by the Tigurini. L. Calpurnius Piſo, one of his lieutenant-generals, a man of great reſolution, prudence, and courage, endeavoured to reſcue him, but periſhed with his general in the attempt. Then the Roman army was left wholly to the conduct of the other lieutenant-general, by name Popilius, an officer of no valour, and very little merit of any other kind. He, to ſave his life, offered to capitulate, ſhamefully ſurrendered his arms and baggage, and, with his whole army, paſſed under the yoke. As ſoon as he returned to Rome, where his name was become odious, he was accuſed before the people, and proſecuted with uncommon zeal; but he, to ſave his reputation, went into baniſhment of his own accord, before ſentence was pronounced againſt him [c]. Æmilius Scaurus, prince of the ſenate, got himſelf elected conſul in the room of Caſſius, for the remaining part of the year (H).

The Romans are defeated by the Tigurini, and paſs under the yoke.

But to return to Marius; his being obliged to preſide in the comitia for the election of the new conſul, kept him longer in Rome than he deſired. Being now inveſted with the ſupreme magiſtracy, he treated the nobility with the utmoſt contempt, declaring publicly, that it was matter of greater glory and triumph for him to have humbled the conſcript fathers, by obtaining of the people the command of the army in Numidia, which the ſenate had given to Metellus, [c] Tacit. de German. morib. Cæſ. de bell. Gall. l. i. Cic. l. iii. de legib.

(H) Scaurus had one P. Rutilius for his competitor; but got the better of him by a piece of chicanery. He accuſed Rutilius of bribery in canvaſſing for the conſulſhip; and, in proof of his accuſation, produced a note under his hand, whereby Scaurus pretended, that his competitor had promiſed a citizen money for his vote. The note contained only theſe four letters, A. F. P. R. which Scaurus interpreted thus; Actum fide P. Rutilii, that is, P. Rutilius promiſes to perform the obligation. But C. Cannius, a Roman knight, who was preſent at the trial, gave a very different interpretation to the four letters, making them ſtand for the following ſentence; Æmilius fecit, plectetur Rutilius, that is, Æmilius made the note; but Rutilius will be puniſhed for it; which was accuſing Scaurus of forgery, and at the ſame time ſhewing the folly of laying ſtreſs on the interpretation of initial letters, which are capable of many ſenſes. However, Rutilius was excluded, and Scaurus promoted (3).

(3) Cic. in Bruto.

Marius's inſolent behaviour.

Metellus, than it would be to ſubdue that kingdom, and lead Jugurtha in chains. He inſulted all the patricians he met, and abuſed them in the groſſeſt manner. All his ſpeeches to the people were filled with his own praiſes, and with the moſt bitter invectives againſt the nobility and the ſenate. He was no orator; but every thing was well taken from a man, who was become the idol of the people. This encouraged him to demand with inſolence a greater number of troops than the conſuls had been uſually allowed, and to ſend, of his own authority, to demand auxiliaries of the nations and kings who were in friendſhip with the republic. At Rome, he made his levies with the utmoſt rigor, obliging thoſe who were famed for valour in all parts of Italy to come to Rome, and take the military oaths, tho' they had already ſerved the time required by law; but the people took all the ſeverities of their plebeian conſul in good part, and were ſo zealous to follow him into Africa, that his legions were ſoon completed, and moſtly filled with men of the loweſt claſſes, who were exempted by their poverty from the ſervice. Theſe Marius preferred to any others, as if he had been afraid of having any ſoldiers in his troops, who were of a better condition than himſelf[d].

In the mean time, Metellus, ignorant of what paſſed at Rome, and not doubting, but he ſhould be continued in the command of the army, till the entire reduction of Numidia, took the field; and having, after long and tedious marches, found out at laſt Jugurtha, poſted in places which he thought inacceſſible, he forced him to a battle, in which the Numidians were defeated and diſperſed. The king eſcaped by flight through vaſt deſerts and roads, with which he alone was acquainted, and retired to Thala, a place well fortified, where he had lodged his jewels and treaſures. Metellus followed him croſs the deſert, which was about fifty miles in extent, carrying with him corn enough to ſupport the army fourteen days, and a vaſt number of ſkins and barrels filled with water. The inhabitants of Thala, who thought their city inacceſſible, were ſtruck with terror at the approach of the Roman army. The king, dreading to be ſhut up in the place, immediately abandoned it, and rambled from deſert to deſert, his fear of being betrayed keeping him from fixing any where; but the garriſon, conſiſting moſtly of deſerters from the Roman army, made all the reſiſtance that could be expected from brave men driven

Jugurtha defeated by Metellus.

Thala beſieged by Metellus.

to

[d] Plut. in Mario. Salluſt. ibid.

to deſpair. But when, after forty days ſiege, the Romans had made a large breach in the wall of the city, the garriſon, finding it impoſſible for them to avoid deſtruction, carried all the valuable things they could find to the king's palace, ſet fire to it, and periſhed all to a man in the flames. The proconſul had ſcarce entered the palace, when he was informed, that one Hamilcar, a citizen of Great Leptis, was labouring under-hand to draw over his countrymen to Jugurtha. Hereupon he immediately detached thither four Ligurian cohorts, under the command of Caius Anicius, and by that means kept the neighbouring country in a ſtate of tranquillity. Jugurtha, having now neither troops nor a place of refuge left, determined to go treat in perſon with a people, who had never yet heard of the Roman name. Theſe were the Getuli, a barbarous nation, who inhabited the inner part of Africa, and led their flocks from paſture to paſture, living always in tents, without any fixed habitation. The king having found means to induce them to follow his ſtandards, aſſembled the ſcattered ſhepherds, and taught them to keep their ranks, and obey the officers he ſet over them. From Getulia the Numidian king advanced to the confines of Mauritania, where Bocchus reigned over an African people, ſomewhat leſs barbarous and better diſciplined than the Getuli. As that prince had married one of Jugurtha's daughters, he was eaſily prevailed upon to enter into an offenſive and defenſive league with the Numidian. And now the king being joined by the Getuli and all the forces of Bocchus, appeared a-new in the field, and approached Cyrtha, the capital of Numidia, which Metellus had formerly taken, and made a magazine of arms and proviſions for his army. This obliged the proconſul to alter his conduct; he no longer offered battle, or bid defiance to the enemy, but kept cloſe within his entrenchments, and there watched the motions of the two kings, being determined to venture nothing, for fear of loſing all [e].

And taken.

Jugurtha is joined by Bocchus and the Getuli.

Such was the ſtate of affairs in Numidia, when news was brought to Metellus of the promotion of Marius to the conſulate, and likewiſe to the command of the army. The proconſul, though a great and wiſe man, was thunder-ſtruck to hear, that a mean plebeian, an ungrateful creature of his own, raiſed by his family from the duſt, had found more favour and credit at Rome, than himſelf, notwithſtanding his nobility and exploits. He was ſo much much affected, that he could not forbear weeping, forgetting in a manner the dignity of his character; and indeed what could be more mortifying, than to have a conqueſt ſo far advanced ſnatched out of his hands, by one of the meaneſt of the people, drawn out of obſcurity by himſelf? But, after all, he was not ſo much grieved, as Salluſt informs us, at the glory he loſt, as at the advancement of Marius, who had decried his conduct, only to raiſe himſelf upon the ruins of his reputation. However, as in great minds the public good prevails over private reſentment, the proconſul ſpared no means to draw off Bocchus from Jugurtha, tho' this would greatly facilitate the reduction of Numidia for his rival. He ſpent the whole time he remained in Numidia in private negotiations with that prince, who thereupon was leſs preſſing to give him battle, which was partly what the proconſul had in view. At length advice came, that Marius was landed at Utica, with a very numerous body of Romans and allies.

[e] Idem ibid.

Marius lands in Africa.

Hereupon Metellus, not being able to bear the thoughts of paying his homage to the new conſul, who had ſo treacherouſly and baſely ſupplanted him, inſtantly left the camp, which he had pitched near Cyrtha, and returned to Italy, after having appointed Rutilius, one of his lieutenants, to deliver up the army to his perfidious and ungrateful rival. His preſence at Rome, and the account he gave of the ſucceſs of his arms, of the towns he had taken, of the provinces he had conquered, and of the battles he had fought, ſoon wiped off the calumnies which had been caſt upon him. The eſteem and reſpect, which had been formerly ſhewn for that great man, revived; he was received every where with loud acclamations, and the people, to make him ſome amends for the injuſtice done him, decreed him, with an unanimous conſent, a triumph and the glorious ſurname of Numidicus [f]. Velleius Paterculus obſerves here, that there were, at this time, above twelve perſons of the family of Metellus in Rome, who had been ſucceſſively raiſed either to the conſulate or cenſorſhip, and many of them honoured with triumphs, in leſs than twelve years [g]. But, notwithſtanding his nobility, his exploits, and his great reputation for probity, a tribune of the people had the boldneſs to accuſe him of having plundered the province from which he came; but when he produced his books books in his defence, the Roman knights who were judges in these civil causes, refused to examine his accounts, declaring, that they thought the whole course of his life a stronger proof of his innocence, than the wax, on which he had set down his disbursements and receipts [n].

Metellus is decreed a triumph.

[f] Vell. Paterc. l. ii. c. 2. [g] Idem ibid.

In the mean time, Marius put himself at the head of the army; but, as the troops he had brought with him were for the most part new levies, he did not care to run the hazard of a general action. He only watched the motions of the new kings, besieged some weak places, and prevented the enemy from making incursions into the countries which had submitted to Rome. Marius, having thus spent the summer, without any considerable exploit, his troops began to despise him, and to look upon Metellus as a much better general than his successor. To remove these prejudices, which began to prevail, he resolved on an enterprize which would be sufficient to raise his reputation, and eclipse the glory of his predecessor. The city of Capsa stood in the middle of the burning sands of Africa, surrounded on all sides by a vast desert, which made it in a manner inaccessible, especially by great armies. This city he resolved to besiege; and having provided corn and water, which he knew he should want in the desert, he set out on his march, without communicating his design even to his own lieutenants. He marched only by night, the rays of the sun being so strongly reflected by the sand, that his men could not bear the heat by day. In this manner he passed that inhospitable country, which was inhabited only by serpents of an enormous size, which heat and hunger made very troublesome. After three nights march, with what danger and fatigue the reader may imagine, the army came within two miles of Capsa before day-break. They then halted among some hills, which covered the city and intercepted the sight of the legions, and there waited, as in an ambush, till the sun appeared; when Marius detached his light-armed infantry to seize the gates, and, appearing at the same time with his whole army before the place, struck the inhabitants with such terror, that they offered to surrender, upon condition that they should have their lives spared; but Marius, to fill all Numidia at once with the dread of his name, entered the place sword in hand, levelled it with Marius takes Capsa.

[n] Val. Max. l. ii. c. 18. Cic. ad Attic. l. i. epist. 16.

with the ground, put all the citizens, who were able to bear arms, to death, and ſold the reſt for ſlaves. This barbarous inſtance of ſeverity ſpread terror far and near; the people, where-ever he came, ſubmitted to him, and many, without waiting for his preſence, ſent deputies to him, imploring his protection, and offering to ſupply his army with all ſorts of proviſions. He marched to the utmoſt confines of Numidia, and, in that long march, met with one place only which refuſed to ſubmit to him.

Beſieges Mulucha.

This was a caſtle called Mulucha, ſituated on the ſummit of a rock, and perhaps the ſtrongeſt fortreſs then in the world. It was of no larger extent than the top of the rock, which was one entire body of flint, ſtanding quite by itſelf, and naturally ſo very ſmooth, that there was not the leaſt hold for the hands, or projection for the feet to reſt on. The only way up to it was what the inhabitant had cut in the rock, ſo narrow, that two men could not, without difficulty, walk a-breaſt in it. However, Marius undertook the reduction of the place; but the beſieged threw ſuch a quantity of firebrands from the tops of their ramparts, and rolled downthe rock ſuch vaſt ſtones, that the machines were burnt, and thoſe who managed them dangerouſly wounded. The attempt was often renewed, but always proved fruitleſs; beſides, the caſtle was ſo well ſtored with proviſions and ammunition, and the ſeaſon ſo far advanced, that the Roman general could not entertain any thoughts of reducing it by famine: yet he perſiſted; and at length mere chance did more than his utmoſt efforts could have effected. A Ligurian ſoldier, having obſerved ſome ſnails creeping along the rocks, as he was filling his pitcher at a neighbouring fountain, took it in his head to climb up after them. The higher he went, the more ſnails he found in the cracks of the rock, which was moiſter on this ſide than any other. In the mean time, the attack was carrying on on the oppoſite ſide; and this encouraged the Ligurian to mount up to the very top of the rock. When he came to the foot of the wall, he found it quite deſerted on that ſide by the garriſon, who were all engaged in repulſing the aggreſſors on the other. Being therefore under no apprehenſion, his curioſity led him to get up upon the wall, which he did by the help of an old oak that grew cloſe to it. When he had, from the wall, taken a view of the place, he ſlid down the rock, without being diſcovered, and returned to the camp. He did the ſame thing a ſecond time, and particularly examined mined, whether it were possible to introduce a company of active and intrepid men into the place that way. In the mean time, Marius, discouraged by the ill success of his attempts, was in suspense, whether he should give over the enterprize and put an end to the campaign; but when the Ligurian acquainted him with his exploit, he conceived some hopes of making himself master of the place, and immediately sent experienced officers to view the rock, and report their sentiments. Of these some thought the thing impracticable; but others, more bold and enterprising, declared, that, in their opinion, the attempt, if well conducted, might succeed. As the loss, at all adventures, could not be great, the opinion of the latter prevailed; and the Ligurian was put at the head of four centuries of chosen men, provided with hooks, cramping-irons, nails, and hammers. These filed off in the night, and lay in ambush near the fountain, till the attack was renewed the next day. Then, while the garrison was engaged on the opposite side, with the help of their tools they got up, not without great labour, to the foot of the wall, which they easily mounted. Marius had sent a company of trumpets with them, ordering them to sound the alarm, as soon as they had got on the ramparts; which they did accordingly, and with that unexpected noise so terrified the besieged, that they abandoned the attack on the other side, and by that means gave the legionaries an opportunity of advancing up the narrow path to the gate, which they broke down, and entering the fortress, joined their companions. Being thus masters of the place, they put both the garrison and inhabitants to the sword without distinction, seized the king's treasures, and then went into winter-quarters, loaded with glory and booty [i]. Mulucha taken.

Soon after the reduction of Mulucha, Lucius Cornelius Sylla landed at Utica, with a reinforcement for the consular army. He was by birth a patrician, and descended from one of the most illustrious families in Rome. He had something very engaging in his conversation, was of a graceful aspect, a noble air, easy manners, affable, insinuating, and ever ready to oblige all, even at the expence of his own fortune, which was but very small; for his branch of the Cornelian family had been long eclipsed. The character of Sylla.

One

[i] Sallust. ibid. Front. strat. l. iii. c. 9.

One of his anceſtors, by name Publius Cornelius Rufinus, a ſenator of great reputation, having been degraded by the cenſors, for keeping in his houſe, contrary to law, ten pounds weight of ſilver in plate, his diſgrace deſcended to his poſterity, who continued long in obſcurity, and were excluded from honours and public offices, as Plutarch informs us, to the ſixth generation. Sylla, in his youth, fell in with the cuſtoms of the young patricians of his time, and gave himſelf entirely up to pleaſures and debauchery, keeping company only with lewd women, ſtage-players, and buffoons; in ſhort, he was reckoned one of the moſt debauched and effeminate young men in Rome. A young courteſan, named Nicopolis, taken with his graceful perſon, ſupplied him plentifully with money, which was the fruit of her debaucheries; and, as the young Roman proved conſtant to her, ſhe left him great wealth at her death. Soon after his mother-in-law likewiſe died, and left him a plentiful eſtate. From that time, as he was ſatiated with pleaſures, he began to be tired with a private life, and, his wealth rouſing his ambition, he demanded, and obtained the quæſtorſhip, the ſame year that Marius was raiſed to the conſulate. The people, whom he eaſily gained by his gentle and obliging carriage, appointed him to ſerve under Marius, who was then ready to ſet out for Africa; but that general, thinking, that a man of pleaſure could never prove a good ſoldier, or that a body, enervated by vice and debauchery, could bear the fatigues of war, was highly diſpleaſed with the quæſtor allotted him, and therefore left him behind in Italy, under pretence of raiſing a reinforcement of auxiliary troops among the allies, but in reality to get rid of a man, of whoſe conduct in war he had but a very mean opinion. The quæſtor, tho' very ſenſible of the contempt ſhewn him, obeyed, and came not to the army till after the reduction of Mulucha, when the troops were ready to go into winter-quarters. The moment he arrived in Africa, he threw off the man of pleaſure, was always ready to undertake the moſt painful and laborious duties, contented himſelf with the food of the common ſoldiers, and, by affecting to imitate Marius, gained both his eſteem and friendſhip: ſo that nothing now ſeemed wanting to the quæſtor, but an opportunity to give proofs of his valour. It was the quæſtor's province to ſupply the troops with proviſions, and the neceſſary ſums for carrrying on the war; but this office did not exempt him from partaking of the dangers, or prevent prevent his commanding the troops. In an action the quæſtor performed the office of the firſt lieutenant general of the army, immediately under the chief commander; and in this office Sylla ſignalized himſelf, as we ſhall ſee in the courſe of this war, and carefully improved the opportunities that offered of recovering the time he had loſt [k].

Sylla's change in conduct.

MARIUS, after the taking of Mulucha, retired towards the ſea coaſt, with a deſign to put his troops into winter-quarters in the maritime cities, that by this means they might be the more eaſily ſupplied with proviſions. But in his retreat his army was ſurprized by the united forces of the two kings, who, coming unexpectedly upon them towards the cloſe of day, charged them with great fury. As the Romans were neither upon their guard, nor armed for fighting, nor drawn up in battalia, the legionaries, being hard preſſed by the Mauritanian and Getulian cavalry, began to give ground. But, in the mean time, the Roman cavalry, arriving very ſeaſonably, made head againſt the enemy, and ſuſtained the ſhock of their cavalry, till the legionaries drew up, and put themſelves in a poſture of defence. Then a tumultuary battle, or rather a great fray, enſued: none of the ſoldiers repaired to their colours; but fought, as they could, horſe and foot mixed together, without any rule or order. Both Marius and his quæſtor diſtinguiſhed themſelves on this occaſion in a very eminent manner; the latter fell, like a lion, on a troop of barbarians, who had already ſurrounded one of the manipuli, and cut moſt of them in pieces; the former ſeemed to be in all places at once, and, being attended by a body of choice troops, obliged the enemy to give way where-ever he appeared. When it began to grow dark, Marius retired by degrees to two neighbouring hills, and, having there rallied his troops, fortified in all haſte that which was leaſt ſteep, poſting his men on the declivity of the two hills, and in the valley between them. At the foot of one of the hills was a plentiful ſpring of freſh water, a great refreſhment to troops fatigued with a long march and a warm battle. The two kings ſurrounded the hills, on which the Romans were poſted, with numberleſs multitudes of Numidians, Mauritanians, and Getulians, who all looked on this action only as the beginning of a certain victory, which they ſhould complete at the riſing of the ſun. Jugurtha did not doubt, but he ſhould be able to extinguiſh the Roman

The two kings ſurpriſe Marius.

[k] Salluſt. ibid. Plut. in Syll. & Mar.

man name in Numidia; and the African ſoldiers, looking upon the conſular army as a certain prey, kindled great fires, danced round them with loud ſhouts, and paſſed the beſt part of the night in feaſtings and rejoicings. Marius, who ſaw, from the eminence on which he was encamped, all that paſſed, kept within his entrenchments, till the enemy, tired with dancing and revelling, retired to their tents to refreſh themſelves with ſleep, that they might be able to renew the attack at break of day with more vigor. He then drew out his legions in order of battle; and, placing all the trumpets in the firſt line, advanced in ſilence and good order towards the enemy. When he was within reach of them, the trumpets ſounded the charge, and made ſo terrible a noiſe, that the barbarians, who were moſt of them aſleep, had not in that ſurpriſe the courage to take up their arms, but fled, many of them half naked, in the utmoſt confuſion. The Romans purſued the fugitives, and made a dreadful ſlaughter of the diſarmed multitude. We are told, that Jugurtha and Bocchus loſt more men in this ſurpriſe, than in any other action. Four days after this defeat, they again came up with the Roman army, hoping to find them once more off their guard. But Marius, who was ready to receive them, made ſuch a ſlaughter of the barbarians, that he had reaſon to believe the war near ended. The enemy's army, which had been juſt reinforced by a numerous body, under the command of Volux the ſon of Bocchus, and conſiſted of ninety thouſand men, was almoſt entirely cut off. Jugurtha on this occaſion gave uncommon proofs of his valour and conduct. At the head of his cavalry he broke through the firſt line of the Romans, and, ſhewing his bloody ſword to the legionaries, cried out in the Latin tongue, which he had learnt at the ſiege of Numantia, Marius is dead. This ſword is ſtained with his blood. Hereupon the ſecond line of the Romans began to give ground, and the Numidians, animated by the example of their king, renewed the charge with more fury than ever. But, in the mean time, Sylla, having routed the numberleſs forces of Bocchus and Volux, arrived very ſeaſonably at the head of the cavalry, revived the courage of the legionaries, and falling upon the enemy's flank robbed them of a victory which they thought certain. The Numidians, in ſpight of their utmoſt efforts, were forced to fly before Sylla, who, laying hold of all opportunities to efface the prejudice entertained of his effeminacy, performed wonders. The king himſelf, who retired tired with his Numidians, narrowly escaped falling into his hands. Thus Sylla displayed for the first time his courage and intrepidity greatly to his advantage. Marius had the honour of conducting the whole action with the prudence of a great commander, and Sylla that of executing the orders of his general with uncommon valour [1].

Who ſurpriſes them in his turn, and puts them to flight.

The confederate kings defeated a ſecond time.

Sylla's bravery.

THE labours of the campaign were succeeded by negotiations. Bocchus, who had been long inclined to peace, sent an embassy to the consul, desiring him to dispatch some persons to him, to whom he might safely communicate his thoughts. Hereupon Marius immediately appointed Sylla his quæstor and Manlius one of his lieutenants, to wait upon the king. In their first audience, Sylla endeavoured, not only to draw off Bocchus from Jugurtha, but to prevail upon him to deliver up the Numidian king alive into the consul's hands. But Bocchus, without taking any notice of what Sylla had said on that head, only begged leave to send an embassy, first to the consul, and then to Rome, to negotiate a peace and alliance with the Roman senate and people. This the quæstor readily granted, and then set out with his collegue Manlius for Cirtha, where Marius then was in winter quarters. They were soon followed by five embassadors, all men of great distinction, from the king of Mauritania; but, Marius being gone from Cirtha to surprise a castle at a great distance, which was said to be full of Roman deserters, the embassadors proceeded to Utica, where Sylla commanded the main body of the army in the consul's absence. Sylla received them with the highest marks of honour; and, upon the return of the consul, who failed in his attempt upon the castle, their proposals were accepted, a truce was agreed on between the Romans and Mauritanians, and two of the embassadors sent back to carry the news to the king, while the other three embarqued for Italy, with the second quæstor Cneius Octavius, who was lately come from Rome, with large sums for the payment of the troops and other expences of the war. When they arrived at Rome, they found C. Attilius Serranus and Q. Servilius Cæpio in the consulate. The latter had Narbonne Gaul, and the former Italy, for his province. Marius was continued in the command of the army in Africa in quality of proconsul, and Sylla confirmed in his office with the title of proquæstor. The senate when they heard from the embassadors

Bocchus treats with the Romans.

Sends embassadors to the consul and to Rome.

[1] Sallust. & Plut. ibid.

the requeſt of their maſter, returned them the following anſwer: Thé ſenate and people of Rome are not eaſily reconciled to thoſe who have dared, without any provocation, to bear arms againſt them. Nevertheleſs, the repentance of Bocchus diſarms us. Let him enjoy the truce with which Marius has favoured him, and the peace which we now grant him. But as to an alliance with Rome, it is incumbent on him firſt to deſerve it by ſome important ſervices. By this Bocchus well knew was meant his delivering up Jugurtha, and being reſolved to comply with the deſire of the ſenate, he entreated Marius to ſend Sylla to him, in order to facilitate the execution of his deſign. Sylla, ready to run all hazards in the negotiating of an affair, which would put an end to the war at once, willingly accepted of the office. Jugurtha, in the mean time, though in want of every thing, ſtill ſupported himſelf by his courage. When he heard of the treaty which the Mauritanian had juſt concluded with Rome, he ſent one Aſpar, a faithful and able miniſter, to Bocchus, not doubting, but he ſhould be able, by well-conducted negotiations and by the mediation of his ſon-in-law, to get himſelf included in the treaty, and ſave both his perſon and part of his dominions. As Aſpar arrived at the Mauritanian court before Sylla, he inſinuated himſelf ſo much into the king's affections, that he had very like to have gained him over entirely to his maſter's intereſt. A Numidian prince, named Dabar, grandſon to Maſiniſſa by a concubine and greatly attached to the Romans, being then at the court of the Mauritanian, employed all his intereſt in favour of the republic, and with much ado kept Bocchus wavering between Rome and Jugurtha.

A peace is granted him by the ſenate.

Sylla ſets out for the Mauritanian court.

SYLLA was already upon the road to Mauritania, with a pretty numerous guard of cavalry, light-armed infantry, archers, ſlingers, and a whole cohort of Peligni. After five days march he was met by Volux, the ſon of Bocchus, at the head of a thouſand choſen men. The proquæſtor received the king's ſon with all the politeneſs and addreſs that was natural to him, and marched with him the firſt day without the leaſt appearance of diſtruſt. When the ſun was down, they encamped together; and then Volux, entering in great haſte the Roman commander's pavilion, told him, that he was informed by his ſcouts, that Jugurtha was near with a body of troops far ſuperior to theirs when joined together, This, with the advice the Mauritanian gave Sylla, made the Roman ſuſpect both both him and his father of treachery. Let us fly, ſaid the young prince, and leave our camp and men to the mercy of the enemy. I will take upon me to conduct you to a place of ſafety in the dark. The brave pro-quæſtor, ſhocked at this propoſal, replied reſolutely, Shall I fly before an enemy who has been ſo often vanquiſhed? Shall I be coward enough to abandon my men without a leader? I know the valour of my troops; and either they ſhall conquer with me, or I periſh with them. However, Volux prevailed on Sylla to decamp immediately, and purſue his march in ſilence. But Jugurtha, being informed of what had happened, got before them, and poſted himſelf on the road through which the Romans were to paſs. When the Romans, after having marched all night, obſerved early next morning Jugurtha's army encamped about two miles from them, they cried out, We are betrayed; Volux has ſold us to Jugurtha; let us kill the traytor. But Sylla, putting on an air of ſecurity, encouraged his men to behave like Romans; and then taking Volux aſide, I am fully convinced, ſaid he, that you have betrayed us; but that I may not be as wicked as yourſelf, I will ſave your life. Be gone from the camp this minute, and join the army which Jugurtha has brought againſt us. The Mauritanian, aſtoniſhed, in appearance, at theſe words, replied, I cannot think Jugurtha ſo imprudent, as to inſult an embaſſador who is under the protection of the ſon of the only friend he has in the world. His only aim in ſtopping the way into Mauritania is, to make a merit with the republic of giving Sylla a free paſſage through the midſt of his troops. You will ſee him embrace with pleaſure the opportunity that now offers of making his court to you. Let us go together, without any troops; he will let us paſs unmoleſted. Sylla thought this a dangerous experiment; but nevertheleſs reſolved to run the hazard of it; and accordingly, followed only by his attendants as embaſſador, he paſſed through Jugurtha's army without moleſtation. The Numidian, by thus ſuffering Sylla to paſs unmoleſted, hoped to gain his friendſhip, and by that means be included in the peace. But be that as it will, Sylla from this extraordinary piece of good fortune was ever after called The Fortunate. After he had thus happily eſcaped the hands of Jugurtha, he proceeded with Volux to the court of Bocchus, where he was received in the moſt reſpectful manner. The king, who was ſtill wavering between Rome and Numidia, gave audience to Sylla, and Aſpar the king of Numidia's

Is met by Jugurtha.

Jugurtha ſuffers Sylla to paſs through his army.

His negotiations with Bocchus.

agent, at the ſame time. The former delivered his meſſage with all the pride of a Roman, in theſe words; I only come to know whether you will have war or peace. Take your choice, that I may be gone. This ſtopped the mouth of the Numidian embaſſador; and Bocchus made only this ſhort reply; I am not yet determined. I will take ten days to conſider of it, and then declare my reſolution. Bocchus was inclined to favour Jugurtha; but, on the other hand, he dreaded the power of the Romans; and therefore made it his buſineſs to deceive both embaſſadors. However, he ſeemed to pay moſt deference to Sylla, with whom he had, the night following, a private conference in his own apartment; when he declared, that his arms, auxiliaries, money, and in ſhort the whole power of his kingdom were entirely at the diſpoſal of the ſenate and people of Rome. I give up, ſaid he, Jugurtha to your reſentments, and am determined to lend no further aſſiſtance to a prince who has incurred your diſpleaſure. What more can you deſire? Sylla, on the other hand, juſtified the proceedings of Rome againſt Jugurtha, magnified the favour ſhewn to the Mauritanian by the peace, and then, with regard to the moſt material part of his commiſſion, went on thus: The moſt powerful kings cannot obtain an alliance with Rome, but by ſome very extraordinary piece of ſervice. Seize then the opportunity which fortune offers you. It is now in your power to ſeize and deliver up Jugurtha to us. Your ſacrificing that perfidious uſurper will procure you the friendſhip of our republic, and eſtabliſh you on the throne of your anceſtors for ever. Nor is this all: the beſt part of Numidia will be the reward of your bringing to puniſhment a wicked, ungrateful, and treacherous wretch, whoſe hands are yet ſtained with the innocent blood of his brothers. Aſſiſt Rome then in executing the vengeance of the gods: deliver up Jugurtha into my hands before my departure, and depend on the perpetual protection and friendſhip of the Romans. Bocchus, pretending to be ſurpriſed at the propoſal, cried out, What! betray a father-in law, a neighbouring king, a friend, an ally! What will all Africa think of ſuch a black treachery? But Sylla, who was very eloquent, by preſſing and urging in the ſtrongeſt terms, that nothing elſe could procure him the friendſhip of Rome, obtained at length an expreſs promiſe from him to deliver up the king of Numidia into his hands. The expedient they agreed on to enſnare him was, to give him ſome hopes of being included in the treaty of peace with

Bocchus promiſes to deliver up Jugurtha to Sylla.

with Rome, and by that bait draw him to the court of the Mauritanian king. Accordingly, the next morning Bocchus ſent for Aſpar, and, with an unuſual air of gaiety, told him, that the Roman embaſſador ſeemed inclined to include his maſter in the treaty of peace. Inform him therefore, ſaid he, that the critical time for putting an end to ſo deſtructive a war is come, and adviſe him to haſten hither, and finiſh the negotiation in perſon. With this good news Aſpar immediately ſet out for Jugurtha's camp, and in eight days returned to Bocchus's court with this anſwer; that his maſter was very deſirous of putting an end to ſo troubleſome a war; but that, as the ſenate often diſannulled the treaties concluded with their conſuls, no wiſe man would enter into negotiations with them, unleſs he had ſome ſecurity for the performance of the articles; that in the preſent caſe he ſaw that nothing could ſecure to him the peace which Marius was negotiating, except the delivering up of the proconſul's embaſſador into his hands; that if he were detained, this would be a powerful motive for the ſenate to confirm a treaty, which they could not break but by ſacrificing ſo illuſtrious a patrician. The Mauritanian was ſo ſtruck with this propoſal, that he immediately came into it; ſo that he had now baſely engaged to deliver up the Roman to the Numidian, and the Numidian to the Roman. As he had ſolemnly given his word to both embaſſadors, they both equally expreſſed their ſatisfaction. There was no diſtruſt or jealouſy between them; each depended on the promiſe made him, and looked on his rival as enſnared and ſacrificed by the treacherous king. As for Bocchus himſelf, he ſtill continued wavering; his heart was with Jugurtha; but his intereſt inclined him to favour Sylla. In ſhort, he did not determine which of the two he ſhould betray to the other, till the very night before the appointed conference between himſelf, Sylla, and Jugurtha. For the latter, depending upon the promiſe of his ſon-in-law, had left his army, and was already encamped with a ſmall body of choſen troops within reach of the court. When Bocchus received advice of the approach of Jugurtha, he fell into greater perplexity than ever; he could not prevail upon himſelf to betray Jugurtha, his relation, his friend, and his ally; and, on the other hand, he war afraid to ſeize Sylla, and by that piece of treachery draw upon himſelf and his poſterity the vengeance of the powerful republic. He paſſed the night in great anxiety, and was obſerved to walk to and fro in his apartment with unuſual

The double treachery of Bocchus.

unuſual agitations of body, to change colour often, and to fall into deep reflections. After having ſpent ſome hours in private, he at length came to a final determination; and having ſent for Sylla, entered into meaſures with him for drawing Jugurtha into the ſnare. A very high wall was appointed for the place of the conference; and thither Bocchus, by the advice of Sylla, ſent ſome troops before day-break, with orders to conceal themſelves among the neighbouring rocks, and inveſt the hill as ſoon as Jugurtha ſhould appear upon it. This done Bocchus and Sylla, upon advice that the king of Numidia was drawing near, ſet out together to met him. After the firſt civilities, the two kings and the Roman embaſſador proceeded towards the hill. Jugurtha was ſo fully perſuaded, that his father-in-law was going to deliver the illuſtrious Roman into his hands, that he took no other guard with him but ſome few friends. As ſoon as they arrived at the top of the hill, the Mauritanians came out of their ambuſh; but this ſight did not in the leaſt affect the king of Numidia, tho' naturally very ſuſpicious. He believed they were coming to ſeize Sylla, and therefore expreſſed great joy in ſeeing himſelf, as he imagined, at length ſure of his prey. Nor was he undeceived, till the detachment, falling upon his attendants, cut them in pieces, and then ſurrounded and ſeized him. He ſcarce believed his own eyes, till he was delivered into the Roman embaſſador's hands, who loaded him with chains, and ſet out with him, under a ſtrong guard, for Cirtha, which Marius had choſen for the uſual place of his reſidence. When Sylla entered that city with the captive king, the Roman army received him with loud ſhouts, and ſuch demonſtrations of joy and marks of eſteem, as cannot eaſily be deſcribed. They looked upon him as the chief conqueror of Numidia; and this raiſed the envy of his general, who could not help ſhewing his diſpleaſure at the praiſes, which the ſoldiers ſo liberally beſtowed on the pro-quæſtor. He burnt with envy in ſeeing his ſubaltern thus honoured by the ſoldiery, and in a manner preferred to himſelf. And indeed it was but juſt, that Marius ſhould have the mortification of ſeeing the glory of the campaign divided between a ſubaltern and himſelf. He had ſupplanted his predeceſſor Metellus by ſecret artifices and public calumnies; and providence now raiſed up one to avenge his quarrel. From this ſmall beginning the famous wars between Marius and Sylla took their riſe, and did not end, as their mutual jealouſy daily encreaſed, but with the deſtruction ſtruction of the republic [m]. Never was there more univerſal joy in Rome, than at the ſight of the illuſtrious captive whom Marius had ſent them from Africa. By the taking of Jugurtha the war in Numidia was at an end, and that great kingdom entirely reduced. As for the captive king, he was kept in cloſe confinement, to grace the triumph of the proconſul, when he ſhould return from Africa.

Jugurtha delivered up to Sylla. Year after the Flood, 2898. Before Chriſt, 101. Of Rome, 674.

DURING theſe tranſactions in Numidia, the conſul Q. Servilius Cæpio, to whoſe lot Tranſalpine Gaul had fallen, as we have obſerved above, recovered the city of Toloſa, now Toulouſe, the capital of the Tectoſages, from the Cimbri; but ſtained the glory which this conqueſt deſerved, by his avarice and rapines. For he gave the city up to be plundered by his ſoldiers, tho' the inhabitants themſelves had delivered it up into his hands, and robbed the temples of thoſe immenſe ſums which the Tectoſages were ſaid to have brought thither, after having plundered the famous temple of Delphos. Thoſe writers among the antients, who are the moſt modeſt in their computations, make the ſum which Cæpio found in the temple of Apollo in Toulouſe, amount to an hundred thouſand pounds weight of gold, and as many of ſilver. Some writers tell us, that the Tectoſages brought from Delphos a hundred and twenty thouſand pounds weight of gold and five millions of pounds weight of ſilver, which they lodged in the temple of Apollo. But Strabo, Pauſanias, and Polybius, aſſure us, that not one of thoſe Gauls, who were concerned in the plundering of the temple of Delphos, returned home, both gods and men having in a manner combined to extirpate that ſacrilegious race. The immenſe treaſures therefore, with which the temples of the Tectoſages were enriched, could not have been brought from Delphos; but were moſt likely, according to Strabo and Pauſanias, dug out of the ſilver and gold mines, with which the country of the Tectoſages formerly abounded. But from what part ſoever theſe treaſures were brought, it is very certain, that they were immenſely great, and that the general and his troops enriched themſelves by the ſacrilege, without ſuffering the republic to reap any advantage by it. The conſul pretended to ſet apart a conſiderable ſhare for the public treaſury, and ſent it away under a ſmall guard to Marſeilles; but at the ſame time he placed a numerous body on the road, who ſeized it, and privately conveyed it to him.

Cæpio recovers Touloufe from the Cimbri;

And plunders the temples there.

The avarice of Cæpio.

However,

[m] Salluſt. bell. Jugurth. Plut. in Mario & Sylla.

However, as he had retaken Touloufe from the Cimbri, he was continued in the government of Narbonne Gaul with the title of proconſul [n]. During the preſent conſulate, two great men were born, who will furniſh us with ample matter for the ſequel of this hiſtory, viz. The great Pompey at Rome, and the celebrated Cicero in the territory of Arpinum, a city of the Volſci.

THE following year, P. Rutilius Rufus and Cn. Mallius Maximus were advanced to the conſulate; the former a patrician of known abilities and unſpotted reputation; the latter a man of no birth or talents. Nevertheleſs it fell to the lot of Mallius to carry on the war with the Cimbri in Tranſalpine Gaul, at the head of a new army, while his collegue continued inactive in Italy. As for Marius, he w. continued proconſul in Numidia, where he divided the dominions of the deprived king in the following manner: That part which lay next to Mauritania, and was known by the name of Maſeſilia, was aſſigned to Bocchus, and from this time took the name of New Mauritania. Numidia, properly ſo called, was divided into three parts; one was given to Hiempſal, another to Mondreſtal, who were, without all doubt, the next heirs to Maſiniſſa; and the third, which lay next to the Roman province, the republic reſerved for herſelf, and ſubjected it to the prætor, whom ſhe annually ſent to govern the African province [o].

The dominions of Jugurtha, how divided.

IN the mean time, the conſul Mallius haſtened into Gaul to aſſiſt the proconſul Cæpio, who was not ſtrong enough to ſtop the inundation of the Gauls, who were marching from all parts to join the Cimbri, with a deſign to croſs the Alps and invade Italy. The Ambrones, the Tigurini, the Tugenes, the Urbigines, and in ſhort all the nations that inhabited the country now known by the name of Suizzerland, were in motion to join the Northern Gauls, who had already made themſelves maſters of almoſt all the country between Narbonne and the Pyrenees. Mallius ſoon after his arrival quarrelled with Cæpio. Perhaps the latter, who was far ſuperior to the conſul with regard to birth and knowledge in military affairs, did not pay him the reſpect which was due to his character. However that be, it is certain, that their diſputes were carried to ſuch a height, that the officers of the two armies, finding they could not by any means agree, adviſed them to ſeparate: A fatal advice, Cæpio and Mallius quarrel.

[n] Vell. Patercul. l. ii. Plut. Aul. Gell. l. xv. & epiſt. ad Attic.
[o] Appian. de bell. civil. Plut. in Mario.

over against P. 28.

THE BRITISH OCEAN

THE

SEA OF

AQUITAN

GALLIA
NARBONENSIS
LUGDUNENSIS
ET AQUITAINA

PART of SPAIN

Pyrenæan Mountains

THE MEDITERRANEAN SEA

GALLICUS SINUS

LIGVSTICVM MARE

PART OF GERMANY

Oblauni
Ricluna
Sandino
Arica
Cæsarea
Vnelli seu Veneli
Cosedia
Ingena
Biducasses
Biducasium
Abrincatui
Italiocanus Portus
Vorganium
Aletum
Vxantos Ins.
Briuates
Gobeum promont.
Osismii
Rhedones
Condate
Curiosolitæ Cariosuelites
Viridana Portus
Veneti
Dariorigum
Andes
Condivicnum
Liger Flu.
Ven. Insulæ
Juliobona
Caletes
Rotomagus Seguana Flu.
Bratuspantium
Cæsaromagus
Velocasses
Bellovaci
Lexouii
Noviomagus sive Lexovium
Mediolanum
Eburouices
Lara sive Ogia
Augusta Suessanum
Axona Flu.
Augustomagus
Durocortorum Remi
Bibrax
Iatinum
Catalauni
Meldi Matrona Flu.
Parisii
Lutetia
Durocasses
Melodunum
Melodurum
Aulerci Dialitindum
Autricum Carnutum
Cenomani Vindunum
Carnutes
Tricasses
Agendicum Senones
Augustomana Tricassium
Sarta Flu.
Vellaunodunum
Genabum sive Aurelianum Ulædus Flu.
Turones
Liger
Sequana Flu.
Senones
Lingones
Andomedunum Lingonum
Antissiodorum
Tricastinum
Argentuaria
Mandubii
Alesia
Cubi
Avarici Bituriges
Vadicasses
Divionum
Biturriges
Cæsarodunum Turonum
Iuliomagus Anegauum
Condate
Pictones Limonum seu Pictavium Vigenna Flu.
Creuca Flu.
Argantomagus
Portus Santonum
Santonæ
Carantonius sive Canentelus Flu.
Ratiastum
Lemouices Augustoritum Lemauicum
Aruerni
Gergonia
Gergonia Boior. Ager
Boii
Rodumna
Aedui
Matisco Ligeris Flu.
Arar Flu.
Segusiani
Lugdunum
Vienna
Allobroges
Forum Claudii
Cularo seu Gratianopolis
Segusio
Dracus Flu.
Segalauni
Valentia
Lacus Augustus
Tricorii
Vapincum
Druentia Flu.
Ebrodunum
Augusta Tricastinorum
Durio
Vasio
Cavares
Forum Voconii
Dinia
Vindalum
Carpentorate
Arausio
Arausica Lacus
Avenio
Arelate
Massilia
Salyi
Sextiæ Forum
Antipolis
Vocontii
Forum Iulii
Stoechades
Olbia
Tolo Mar
Portus Maurus
Heluii
Andere
Gebenna Mons
Tropæum
Semilian. um
Alba Helviorum
Cottiæ
Padus Flu.
Taurinorum
Genua
Ligures Apuani
Alpes Maritimæ
Vintium
Vada
Nemausus
Volcæ Arecomici
Lutternum
Beterra
Atax Flu.
Narbo Martius
Tolosa
Tolosates
Carcaso
Volcæ Tectosages
Bebrices
Salsulæ
Illiberis
Ruscino
Veneris Promontorium
Tarbelli
Lactoratum
Aquæ Tarbellæ
Elusates
Elusa
Ausci Aturus Flu.
Tarba
Beneharnus
Aquæ Onesiæ
Conuenæ
Pompelo
Lugdunum Convenarum
Garumna Flu.
Nitiobriges
Segedunum
Ruteni
Veronius
Cadurci
Tarnis Flu.
Olidus Flu.
Deuona sive Diuona
Cosio
Vasates
Carumna Flu.
Aginnum
Burdegala
Vibisci
Biturriges
Petrocorii
Vesuna Flu. et Petrocorii
Illa Flu.
Duranius Flu.
Augustonemetum
Antros Inf.
Noviomagus
Mediolanum
Rauraci
Augusta Rauracorum
Arola Flu.
Vindonissa
Aquæ Helvetiæ
Helvetii
Sequani
Vesontia
Dubis Flu.
Dola
Tigurum
Rhenus Flu.
Nemetes
Decem Pagi
Argentoratum
Tribocci
Vangiones
Borbetomagus Vangionum
Mediomatrices Divodurum
Nouiomus Nemetum
Rhenus Flu.
Mosella Flu.
Virodunum
Leuci
Fullum
Selina Flu.
Mosella Flu.
Belgium
Lugdunensis Gallia
Rhenus Bri.
Mons Bri.
Arduenna Silua
Aduatici
Lingones
Agrippina Colonia
Legio I. Minervia
Rhenus Flu.
Tungri
Treuiri
Augusta Treuirorum
Mosella Flu.
Sarra Flu.
Nauiliacum
Vindonissa
Aquæ Helvetiæ
Rhenus Flu.
Tigurinus Pag.
Arola Flu.
Iura Mons
Vrbigenus Flu.
Colonia Equestris
Lemanus Lacus
Genoua
Seduni
Sedunum
Rhodanus Flu.
Veragri
Alpes Penninæ
Augusta Prætoria
Iuuo Flu.
Forum Claudii
Durias Flu.
Graiæ Alpes
Cottiæ
Comum
Larius Lacus
Mediolanum
Vercellæ
Padus Flu.
Adula Mons
Augusta Taurinorum
Segusio
Cularo seu Gratianopolis
Dea
Druentia Flu.
Ebrodunum
Padus Flu.
Durio
Segesterica
Dinia
Vindalum
Carpentorate
Arausio
Vasio
Cavares
Forum Voconii
Arausica Lacus
Avenio
Arelate
Massilia
Salyi
Sextiæ Forum
Antipolis
Vocontii
Forum Iulii
Stoechades
Olbia
Tolo Mar
Portus Maurus
Heluii
Andere
Gebenna Mons
Tropæum
Semilian. um
Alba Helviorum
Cottiæ
Padus Flu.
Taurinorum
Genua
Ligures Apuani
Alpes Maritimæ
Vintium
Vada
Nemausus
Volcæ Arecomici
Lutternum
Beterra
Atax Flu.
Narbo Martius
Tolosa
Tolosates
Carcaso
Volcæ Tectosages
Bebrices
Salsulæ
Illiberis
Ruscino
Veneris Promontorium
Tarbelli
Lactoratum
Aquæ Tarbellæ
Elusates
Elusa
Ausci Aturus Flu.
Tarba
Beneharnus
Aquæ Onesiæ
Conuenæ
Pompelo
Lugdunum Convenarum
Garumna Flu.
Nitiobriges
Segedunum
Ruteni
Veronius
Cadurci
Tarnis Flu.
Olidus Flu.
Deuona sive Diuona
Cosio
Vasates
Carumna Flu.
Aginnum
Burdegala
Vibisci
Biturriges
Petrocorii
Vesuna Flu. et Petrocorii
Illa Flu.
Duranius Flu.
Augustonemetum
Antros Inf.
Noviomagus
Mediolanum

J. Wheatley Sculp.t

vice, which brought the republic into greater danger, than had ever threatened her ſince the foundation of the city. The barbarians no ſooner ſaw the Roman forces divided, than they fell upon a ſtrong detachment of the conſular army, which was commanded by M. Aurelius Scaurus, a lieutenant-general of great diſtinction, who had been conſul three years before, cut them all to a man in pieces, and made Scaurus himſelf priſoner. Mallius, greatly intimidated at this defeat. thought proper to call Cæpio to his aſſiſtance. But the proconſul anſwered in a haughty manner, We have each our province; let the conſul take care of himſelf. However, he afterwards drew nearer the conſular army, fearing the conſul might conquer the Gauls without his aſſiſtance, and by that means have all the glory of the campaign. To prevent this, he encamped in the way where the Cimbri muſt paſs to fall on the conſular army, hoping, that he ſhould be able to withſtand the enemy with his own troops, and thereby deprive his rival of the opportunity of ſharing the honour of the victory. As for the Cimbri, when they ſaw the two generals draw near each other, they concluded, that they had made up their differences, and were in perfect union and friendſhip. They therefore ſent deputies to the conſul to propoſe a peace. As theſe deputies could not help paſſing through Cæpio's army, he ordered them to be brought before him; and finding that they were empowered to treat only with Mallius, he treated them like ſpies, and would have put them to death, had not both the legionaries and officers of his army reſtrained his fury, and even forced him to go to the conſul's camp, and confer with him about the propoſals which the enemy had ſent to the republic. But, as he went to the conſul's tent againſt his will, he oppoſed him in all things, contradicted him with great obſtinacy and rudeneſs, and inſulted him in the groſſeſt manner. This encreaſed the hatred between the two commanders; and the Gauls and Cimbri, being informed by their deputies of the miſunderſtanding between the generals, laid hold of this opportunity to give battle. The Gauls attacked Mallius's camp, and the Cimbri Cæpio's. The ſlaughter they made was exceeding great. Fourſcore thouſand men, Romans and allies, with the two ſons of the conſul, and forty thouſand ſervants and ſuttlers, periſhed on this fatal day. Of the two Roman armies only ten men eſcaped, with the two generals to carry the news of ſo dreadful a defeat to Rome. Among theſe was the famous Sertorius, who, being Cæpio and Mallius entirely defeated by the Cimbri and Gauls.

ing yet very young, was making his firſt campaign under Cæpio. As he ſerved in the cavalry and was well mounted, he ſaved himſelf by ſwimming croſs the Rhone. The conquerors deſtroyed all the ſpoils they took, purſuant to a vow they had made before the battle. The gold and ſilver they threw into the Rhone, drowned the horſes they had taken, and put to death all the priſoners. Thus they revenged, without avarice, the injuries done to Apollo, whoſe temple the ſacrilegious and covetous Romans had plundered [p].

THE news of this misfortune filled Rome with fear and conſternation. At the ſame time advice came from Spain, that a prætorian army had been cut in pieces there by the Luſitanians. As both theſe melancholy accounts arrived on the eve of the nones of October, the ſenate ordered, that this ſhould for ever be reckoned among the unlucky days. In this general conſternation, all the ſhops in the city were ſhut up, and the citizens, laying aſide the toga, put on the military habit. They ſaw themſelves threatened with a new deluge of Cimbri and Gauls, numerous enough to over-run the whole country. Two conſular armies, which were their chief dependence, were utterly deſtroyed, and Rome in ſo imminent a danger left quite defenceleſs. The people, highly incenſed againſt Cæpio, iſſued a decree, depoſing him, and declaring him incapable of any command in the Roman armies for the future. As no Roman general, how faulty ſoever, had ſuffered ſo great a diſgrace ſince the beginning of the republic, the decree of the people did not paſs without oppoſition. The nobility and ſenate exclaimed againſt it as a novelty, and a blow which affected the whole body of the patricians, and raiſed ſuch diſturbances in the comitia, that C. Junius Norbanus, tribune of the people, was forced to drive the patricians by force out of the aſſembly. In the fray which happened on this occaſion, M. Æmilius Scaurus, prince of the ſenate, was wounded in the head with a ſtone. The nobility being driven out of the aſſembly with two of the tribunes, L. Cotta and C. Didius, who proteſted againſt the law their collegues had propoſed propoſed, the ſacrilegious Cæpio was depoſed [q]. (I) Upon his depoſition the whole government of the republic for the reſt of the year fell to P. Rutilius Rufus, who being impowered to guard Rome againſt the misfortunes that threatened her, raiſed a new army with incredible expedition, no citizen, who was of age to take arms, being exempted. The conſul would not diſpenſe even with his own ſon, whom, though ſcarce ſeventeen, he obliged to ſerve as a common ſoldier in one of the legions. Rutilius on this occaſion firſt introduced fencing maſters into the Roman camp, whoſe buſineſs it was to teach the young ſoldiers how to handle their arms, attack the enemy, and defend themſelves. By this means the conſul, who was a ſkilful commander, prepared for his ſucceſſor an invincible army [r]. Cæpio depoſed.

[p] Plut. in Sertorio. Vaier. Anſtias apud. Liv. Diodor. Sicul. l. xxxvi.

In the mean time, the Cimbri and Gauls held a council of war, in which ſome were for paſſing the Alps, deſcending into the plains of Inſubria, and advancing towards Rome. Others thought it more advifable to reduce firſt the new Roman province. But before they came to any reſolution they thought it proper to bring into the council

[q] Val. Max. l. vi. c. 9. Cic. de orat. l. ii. in Brut. & pro Balbo. [r] Liv. & Val. Max. l. ii. c. 3.

(I) Cæpio, according to ſome authors, was condemned to baniſhment; according to others, he died in priſon. His body, if we believe Valerius Maximus (4), was cut to pieces by the public executioner, and expoſed to the view of all the Roman people. He had been honoured with a triumph, with the dignity of pontifex maximus, and the title of Protector of the ſenate. But notwithſtanding his former honours and deſerts, he was treated like a common criminal on account of his having been the chief cauſe of the defeat of the Romans by the Cimbri and Teutones. Some writers even tells us, that his body was dragged to the Scalæ Gemoniæ, and there barbarouſly abuſed by the incenſed multitude. But Cicero ſays in expreſs words (5), that Servilius Cæpio, being baniſhed Rome, retired to Smyrna; whence ſome writers, in order to reconcile the antients, have imagined, that he was by the intereſt of his family and friends recalled from baniſhment; but that the tribunes, having revived the old accuſations againſt him, prevailed on the people to ſentence him to death for having ſacrificed the intereſts of his country to his avarice and ambition.

(4) Val. Max. l. vi. c. 9. (5) Cic. in orat. pro Balbo.

council their priſoner Aurelius Scaurus, and aſk his opinion of their deſcent into Italy. The Roman with great conſtancy and intrepidity told them, that they were not to expect from him any advice, which could not be prejudicial to his country, but that he would give them ſuch as might be uſeful for themſelves. He then adviſed them to lay aſide all thoughts of paſſing into Italy, where they would meet with the ſame misfortunes which had formerly befallen Pyrrhus and Hannibal: Enjoy, ſaid he, the glory fortune has given you in your firſt battle. You have gained a victory by the diſagreement of two bad commanders; but when you come to engage the forces of the republic under the conduct of an experienced general, you will find them invincible. Scaurus had ſcarce done ſpeaking, when Bojorix, one of the kings or leaders of the Cimbri, thinking this too inſolent a ſpeech from the mouth of a captive, drew his ſword and ſtabbed him. In the mean time, the republic choſe new conſuls, and raiſed to that dignity C. Fulvius Fimbria and C. Marius a ſecond time. Two laws were urged againſt the promotion of the latter, one forbidding the choice of any abſent perſon, the other enacting, that no one ſhould be raiſed to the conſulate a ſecond time, till ten years after the firſt. But the people made the laws give way to the public good. This news was a very agreeable ſurpriſe to Marius, who was buſy in regulating his conqueſts in Africa, and thought of nothing leſs than his own promotion. He left Numidia without delay, and, returning to Rome about the end of December, on the firſt day of January both entered on his office and triumphed on account of his Numidian conqueſt. His triumphal chariot was preceded by the riches which he had brought from his province, conſiſting of three thouſand ſeven hundred pounds weight of gold in ingots, 5775 pounds weight of ſilver in bars, and 287000 drachmæ, or ſilver denarii, in ſpecie. But nothing ſtruck the ſpectators ſo much as as the ſight of the captive king, who with his two ſons was led in chains before the conqueror's chariot. After he had made a ſhew to the inſulting populace, he was uſed with the utmoſt inſolence by the ſoldiery after the proceſſion. They tore his ears in a barbarous manner in ſnatching away his pendants, with which inſult the unhappy prince was deeply affected. After he had been abuſed in the groſſeſt manner by the rabble, he was thrown into a dungeon, in which he ſoon periſhed. Livy, Eutropius, and Oroſius tell us, that, as ſoon Aurelius Scaurus murdered by the Cimbri.

Marius a ſecond time conſul.

His triumph.

Death of Jugurtha.

ſoon as the ceremony of the triumph was over, he was carried back to priſon, and there ſtrangled. His two ſons ſurvived him, and ſpent their lives in captivity at Venuſium [s].

As ſoon as the victor came down from his chariot, he went to the ſenate-houſe in his triumphal robes, either by miſtake, or out of affectation. But, as the thing was new and the ſenators expreſſed their reſentments by their looks, he went out immediately, pulled off his triumphal robes, and returned in a prætexta, the uſual dreſs of conſuls. The people had already decreed, that Marius ſhould manage the war beyond the Alps, and that Sylla ſhould ſerve under him as his lieutenant-general. As for Fimbria, he was ordered to continue in Italy, to oppoſe the barbarians, in caſe they ſhould croſs the mountains. All that remained was to divide the two armies now on foot between the conſuls. Marius had his choice, and he readily preferred the new legions, which Rutilius had inſtructed, to the old troops which he had brought from Africa. So many honours heaped on a plebeian were a great mortification to the patricians, and encouraged four of the tribunes to make attempts in favour of the people, and greatly to the diſadvantage of the ſenate and nobility. Domitius Ahenobarbus, the great grandfather of the emperor Nero, Caſſius Longinus, Servilius Glaucia, and Marcius Philippus, all propoſed new laws, tending to the diminution of the power of the ſenate, and the three former ſucceeded. The firſt transferred the power of electing the pontifices from their own college to the people. The ſecond got it enacted, that every citizen, degraded by a plebiſcitum, ſhould for ever be deprived of his ſeat in the ſenate. This took away from the ſenators the power of reinſtating thoſe in their honours, whom the people had diſgraced. The third prevailed on the people to paſs a law, in virtue of which, the allies of Latium, who ſhould accuſe a ſenator, and prove their charge, were to enjoy all the privileges of Roman citizens. As for the tribune Marcius Philippus, he attempted to revive the law of Tiberius Gracchus concerning the diſtribution of the lands; but this was thought a ſeditious attempt, and therefore not ſeconded by the generality of the people [t].

Marius appointed to command againſt the Gauls and Cimbri.

The Domitian, Caſſian, and Servilian laws.

In

[s] Liv. epit. l. lxvii. Front. Strat. l. iv. [t] Suet. in Nerone. Val. Max. l. vi. c. 5. Cic. in Verr. act. 3. in Bruto & in Balbo.

In the mean time, Marius ſet out for Tranſalpine Gaul, but finding that the enemy, after the defeat of Cæpio and Mallius, had, inſtead of paſſing the Alps, marched into Spain, being drawn thither by the hopes of booty, he applied himſelf wholly to the perfecting of his troops in diſcipline againſt their return. He taught his troops frugality by his example, and by the ſeverity that appeared in his whole deportment. There was a wildneſs and fierceneſs in his looks not to be deſcribed. The very tone of his voice was ſo rough and harſh, that whenever he gave orders, he made thoſe who received them tremble. This kept his men in exact obedience and ſubjection. In order to inure them to the dangers of battles, he ſent moſt of the young ſoldiers under the command of Sylla to make war on all the enemies of the republic, who were diſperſed from Narbonne to the Pyrenees. Sylla on this occaſion maintained the reputation he had acquired in Numidia, defeated in ſeveral battles the Tectoſages, and took one of their kings, named Copillus, priſoner of war. Notwithſtanding theſe advantages, Marius, not thinking the troops he had brought from Italy ſufficient to withſtand the numberleſs multitudes of Cimbri, Teutones, and Gauls, who would fall upon him on their return from Spain, ſent for ſuccours to the moſt remote parts of the eaſt. Nicomedes, king of Bithynia, to whom, among others, his deputies applied, anſwered, That his dominions were quite exhauſted of men by the vaſt numbers of his ſubjects, who had been carried away and kept in ſlavery by the Roman knights, who farmed the revenues of the republic in the Levant. The ſenate had regard to this juſt complaint, and paſſed a decree, ordering all men of free condition, brought from the country of any ally, to be ſet at liberty. But this decree, however juſt, gave riſe to a new war, of which Marius was the innocent occaſion.

The occaſion of the war with the ſlaves.

Upon the firſt news of this decree, the unhappy ſlaves, without waiting for further orders, broke their chains and ſet themſelves at liberty. The firſt commotion was raiſed at Nuceria, a city of Campania on the banks of the Sarnus; but the tumult was there ſoon ſuppreſſed. A more violent ſtorm was raiſed at Capua by a young Roman knight, named Vettius. After he had ſquandered away his fortune in debauchery, he fell violently in love with a beautiful ſlave, whom he bought upon credit for ſeven Attic talents. But when the time came, that he was either to pay the price agreed on, or return the ſlave to her former mer maſter, to avoid both, he made an inſurrection among the ſlaves, who cultivated the lands of the public in his diſtrict, making uſe of the decree of the ſenate to ſeduce thoſe unhappy wretches. He ſoon drew together four hundred of them, and his firſt exploit was to murder thoſe who had preſſed him to pay for his miſtreſs. He then led his ſmall company to the neighbouring villages and farms, which he put under contribution, being every-where joined by the ſlaves whom he ſet at liberty. When he had aſſembled about ſeven hundred of them, he poſted himſelf in an advantageous ſituation, got himſelf proclaimed king by his followers, who in a ſhort time amounted to three thouſand five hundred, and fortified himſelf in his poſt, which he made an aſylum for all fugitive ſlaves. The ſenate, upon the firſt news of this inſurrection, diſpatched Lucius Lucullus the prætor againſt him, who, taking four thouſand ſix hundred regular troops with him, attacked Vettius, but was repulſed with great loſs. The prætor, finding he could not prevail by force, had recourſe to artifice, gained over one Apollonius, who was general under Vettius, and by his means made himſelf maſter of the place, which the rebels had fortified. But Vettius, ſeeing himſelf betrayed, eſcaped the puniſhment due to his crime, by laying violent hands on himſelf. But this was only a prelude to a more important war in Sicily, which was at this time governed by a prætor, named Licinius Nerva, a weak and timorous man. He at firſt obeyed the decree of the ſenate, ſet at liberty four hundred of thoſe unfortunate men, and ordered all, who had any remonſtrances to make concerning their ſlavery, to repair to him at Syracuſe. The number of theſe poor wretches was much greater than he imagined. He found, that the publicans had, under various pretences, reduced many thouſand freemen to ſlavery, eſpecially in the eaſt, and ſent them into Sicily to cultivate the lands which they farmed of the public. The prætor, quite ſurpriſed at ſuch villainous proceedings, reſolved to ſet all thoſe at liberty who were of free condition, purſuant to the decree of the ſenate. This alarmed the publicans, who thereupon had recourſe to the prætor, and by rich preſents prevailed upon him to ſuſpend the execution of the decree, and to turn his compaſſion into cruelty. Being corrupted by the Roman knights, he began to look upon this multitude of people, who had been carried away by force from their reſpective countries, only as a troubleſome mob, and ſent them back to their masters. But they, instead of returning home, retired to a sacred grove, and there took a resolution of recovering by force the liberty which had been unjustly refused them. They then seized a castle in the neighbourhood, and laid the adjacent country under contribution. The prætor marched against them; but, being too weak to attack them, he prevailed on one of their leaders, named Caius Titinius, to deliver up the castle to him, which he entered in the night. The slaves, though thus surprised, made a vigorous resistance, and perished all to a man, either by the swords of the Romans, or by throwing themselves down from the top of the walls. Licinius having suppressed this first commotion, instead of keeping the field, disbanded his troops, which gave the slaves an opportunity of rising again. They assembled in a few days to the number of six thousand, and, thinking it dangerous for so great a multitude to continue together without a head, they chose one Salvius a flute-player, for their general, and gave him the title of king. Salvius immediately divided his people into three parties, which he sent out under three leaders to pillage the country, and bring all the slaves they could find to his camp. These expeditions succeeded beyond his expectation; for his parties brought him so many men and horses, that he was soon in a condition to form a numerous army, consisting of twenty thousand foot and two thousand horse. He then laid siege to Morgantia, a strong city on the banks of the Simæthus. But while Salvius's troops were engaged before that place, the prætor Licinius, with an army of ten thousand men, partly Italians and partly Sicilians, surprised their camp, which he found almost deserted, and seized the booty which they had brought from the neighbouring farms and villages. From thence the prætor before day-break advanced to the besieged city, and attacked the enemy in the dark, slew great numbers of them and dispersed the rest. But before sun-rising, the new king, having rallied his troops, returned the surprise upon the Romans, who, thinking themselves victorious, were no ways upon their guard, attacked them with great vigor, and having defeated the prætor in his turn, killed six hundred of his men, and took four thousand of them prisoners[u].

The ſlaves riſe at Capua.

Vettius their leader betrayed.

An insurrection among the slaves in Sicily;

Who chose one Salvius for their king;

And defeat the Roman prætor.

THIS victory encouraged Salvius to renew the siege of Morgantia with more vigor than ever. The slaves of the place, place, upon their maſters promiſing them their liberty, if they repulſed or tired out the aggreſſors, performed exploits which could hardly be expected from men of their condition; inſomuch, that Salvius was at length obliged to raiſe the ſiege. But the Morgantines, at the inſtigation of the baſe prætor, refuſed to grant the deliverers of their country the liberty they had promiſed them; which ſo incenſed theſe brave men, that they abandoned their maſters, whom they had defended with ſo much gallantry, and went over to the enemy. Thus the evil daily encreaſed, and the contagion ſpread through all parts of Sicily. A ſlave, born in Cilicia, and named Athenio, made a freſh inſurrection among his fellows in the neighbourhood of Egeſta and Lilybæum, and, having killed his maſter, put himſelf at the head of the two hundred ſlaves he had in his ſervice; and, his party being ſoon encreaſed to the number of ten thouſand, he had the confidence to lay ſiege to Lilybæum, at that time by far the ſtrongeſt place in the iſland. After he had ſpent much time in this fruitleſs attempt, he pretended to be adviſed by the gods to abandon the enterpriſe, crying out, as in a ſudden tranſport, Let us, my friends, be gone this inſtant from a place where a melancholy fate is preparing for us. If we perſiſt in this attempt, we ſhall be undone. Let us then make our advantage of the knowledge that is given me from heaven. While his army was decamping, a fleet arrived from Mauritania, ſent by Bocchus to the aſſiſtance of the Romans, under the command of one Gomon, who, entering the port of Lilybæum, landed his troops, and fell upon the rear of Athenio's army. The head of the rebels had, without all doubt, been informed of the approach of this fleet; but his ſoldiers looked upon him ever after as a man highly favoured by the gods. On the other hand, Salvius, finding his army to be thirty thouſand ſtrong, reſolved to make Triocala the capital of his new dominions, and accordingly built a citadel there on the ruins of an old demoliſhed caſtle, raiſed himſelf a fine palace, ſurrounded the place with a wide ditch, and even ſettled a kind of polity in his city, chuſing himſelf a council, conſiſting of his friends and the moſt prudent of his ſubjects. When he had ſettled all things in his new colony, he invited Athenio to come and partake of the pleaſures of the place, and to deliberate about the proper meaſures for promoting their common intereſt. Athenio accepted of the invitation, and came attended with only three thouſand of his men.

[u] Flor. l. iii. c. 19. Diodor. Sicul. Eclog. l. l. xxxvi.

A freſh inſurrection raiſed by Athenio.

Salvius fixes his habitation at Triocala.

Seizes Athenio.

But he no ſooner entered Triocala, than Salvius cauſed him to be ſeized, and clapped up in his new caſtle. Such were the beginnings of this war, which coſt the Romans a great deal of blood [x]. But to return to Marius.

WHILE he was waiting for the return of the Cimbri to Narbonne Gaul, he kept an exact diſcipline in his camp, and puniſhed vice with the utmoſt ſeverity. From the following inſtance we may judge of the abhorrence he had for the moſt infamous of all debaucheries, which licentiouſneſs too often introduced into the Roman armies. His nephew Caius Lucius, having made a ſcandalous attempt upon a young ſoldier, by name Trebonius, was killed by him. As he was a military tribune, his death made a great noiſe. But the conſul, though much affected with the death of his nephew, not only acquitted Trebonius, whom ſome vile flatterers warmly accuſed, but rewarded him for his courage, putting with his own hands one of thoſe crowns on his head, which generals only beſtowed on ſoldiers who had ſignalized themſelves by ſome valiant action. The applauſes the army gave Marius on this occaſion ſoon reached Rome, and greatly contributed towards continuing him in the conſulate, and in the command of the army in Tranſalpine Gaul. Though abſent, he was, without oppoſition, proclaimed conſul a third time. Even his moſt inveterate enemies, Craſſus Metellus and Marcus Scaurus, approved of his election, ſacrificing their private reſentments to the public welfare. The collegue the republic gave Marius was L. Aurelius Oreſtes, who continued ſome time at Rome, where he was employed in trying T. Albucius, prætor of Sardinia, whom the people condemned to baniſhment, for vainly decreeing himſelf a triumph in his province, without the conſent either of the ſenate or people, though he had done nothing that deſerved it [y]. During theſe tranſactions at Rome, Marcus Fulvius, the prætor in Spain, gained great reputation by his conduct againſt the Cimbri. Though he had but one legion under his command, he found means to harraſs thoſe barbarians in ſuch a manner, as made them leave Spain and return to Gaul. But, before their arrival, a ſwarm of Marſi appeared there, with a deſign to join the Teutones, and enter Italy with them. The Marſi were natives of Germany, and inhabited the banks of the Luppia, or, as Strabo calls it, the Luppias.

The equity of Marius, in his nephew's cauſe.

[x] Diodor. Sicul. ibid. [y] Jul. Obſeq. c. 103. Cic. de provinc. conſular.

Luppias. This river riſes at Lipſprink, a village of Weſtphalia, and falls into the Rhine after having watered the dutchy of Cleves. Marius detached Sylla to oppoſe this new inundation of barbarians; and he choſe rather to make uſe of perſuaſion than force; he deſired a conference with their leaders, in which he prevailed on them to change their reſolution, and come over to the Romans. From this time we find no farther mention made of Sylla in the army of Marius, but in that of the collegue the republic gave him the next year. Perhaps Marius was glad to get rid of a ſubaltern, who began to eclipſe the glory of his general. Towards the end of the preſent year, the conſul Aurelius Oreſtes died in his camp, at the foot of the Alps on the ſide of Italy; ſo that the republic was obliged to recal Marius to preſide at the new elections. He left the command of his army to Manius Aquilius, and returned with joy to Rome, where he acted a part very ſuitable to his ambition. The point he had in view was, to get himſelf nominated conſul for the next year. But this was a tender point, and might give offence to the people, it being a thing unheard-of, that the ſame perſon ſhould ſo often be choſen conſul ſucceſſively. He therefore publicly declared, that he would not even ſuffer his name to be entered among thoſe of the candidates. But, at the ſame time, Lucius Apuleius Saturninus, one of the tribunes and his creature, being in the ſecret with him, acted a very different part. He in all his harangues exhorted the people to force Marius to accept of the conſulate. But the more preſſing the people were with him, the more determined he pretended to be not to comply with their requeſt. The tribune in one of his ſpeeches even called him knave and traytor, for reſiſting the will of the people, and refuſing to ſerve his country when threatened with great danger. In ſhort, the game was ſo artfully played, that the people nominated Marius conſul the fourth time, and forced him, much againſt his will, as they imagined, to accept of the dignity. The nobility indeed laughed at his ſham modeſty, and ſaw through the diſguiſe, but thought his aſſiſtance neceſſary, at a time when the ſtate was in the utmoſt danger; and therefore did not oppoſe his election. The collegue given him was Q. Lutatius Catulus (K), a man greatly eſteemed both by the ſenate and people [z].

The Marſi gained over by Sylla.

Marius again conſul.

[z] Plut. in Mario. Cic. in Bruto. & pro Sextio.

(K) Cicero, in different places of his works, gives us the character

ALL Gaul was in motion, and the ſeaſon and approach of the enemy made the conſuls haſten to their poſts. The two conſuls ſet out from Rome at the ſame time, leaving the city in great conſternation, on account of the new troubles both abroad and at home. Abroad, the Thracians had raiſed great diſturbances in Macedon ever ſince the laſt year. The rebellious ſlaves laid waſte Sicily, and reduced Rome to great ſtreights for want of corn. The Cilician pirates infeſted the Mediterranean, and contributed as much to the famine which afflicted Rome, as the devaſtations in Sicily. Againſt the pirates was ſent a man, who ſeemed moſt nearly concerned to deſtroy them, viz. the famous orator M. Antonius, whoſe daughter they had carried into captivity. He ſoon cleared the ſeas of thoſe robbers, and on that account was honoured with a triumph [a]. At home, new diſturbances were raiſed by Lucius Apuleius Saturninus, who endeavoured to promote one Lucius Equitius Firmanus to the tribunate. He was a freed-man, and his parents, nay even his tribe, were utterly unknown. But Apuleius knew him to be a bold, active, and intrigueing man, an inveterate enemy to the nobility, and therefore a proper tool to be employed againſt the racter of Quintus Lutatius Catulus. His good nature, ſays he, and his polite behaviour prejudiced all men in his favour. His eloquence, his agreeable manner of ſpeaking, and the purity of his expreſſions gained him the hearts of his hearers. He was an orator, an hiſtorian, and a poet. He wrote hiſtorical memoirs of his conſulate after the manner of Xenophon, whom he took for his model. He employed his leiſure hours in poetical performances; but, according to Ovid and Pliny the younger, the levity of his muſe did not become the gravity of his character. Aulus Gellius has preſerved one of his epigrams on a child named Theotimus, which he produces as a maſter-piece of elegance and politeneſs (5). Cicero quotes another wrote by Catulus on young Roſcius (6), whoſe beauty he greatly extols, though the youth ſquinted, as Cicero obſerves. Tho' Catulus was much beloved by the people, and highly eſteemed by all ranks of men, yet he had the mortification to be twice diſappointed of the conſulate, and to ſee men of no merit preferred to him (7).

The Cilician pirates deſtroyed by M. Antonius.

[a] Vell. Patercul. l. iii. Flor. l. iii. Liv. epit. l. lviii. Tacit. Annual. 12. Cic. de orat. l. i.

(5) Vide Aul. Gell. Nect. Atticæ, l. xix. (6) Cic. de nat. deor. l. i. (7) Cic. in Bruto.

the patricians. As the ſeditious tribune was well appriſed, that the birth of Equitius would be the greateſt obſtacle to his advancement, he made him take the name of Gracchus, and preſented him to the people as the ſon of Tiberius Gracchus. But Q. Cæcilius Metellus, ſurnamed Numidicus, being at this time one of the cenſors, diſcovered the cheat, and refuſed even to inroll Equitius among the Roman citizens. His refuſal had like to have coſt him dear; for he very narrowly eſcaped being ſtoned by the populace, at the inſtigation of Apuleius.

Diſturbances raiſed by the tribune Apuleius.

In the mean time, Marius was waiting for the Cimbri in Tranſalpine Gaul. But they appeared there no more, having in a great council of war reſolved to enter Italy by two different ways, the Cimbri over the eaſtern, and the Teutones, Ambrones, and other Gauliſh and Helvetian nations over the weſtern, Alps. Marius therefore marched to oppoſe the latter, and poſted himſelf near the place where the preſent city of Arles ſtands. As the mouth of the Rhone was ſtopped up with heaps of ſand and mud, which the waves continually lodged there, Marius, to ſupply his army with proviſions brought up the river, undertook a great and laborious work, which from him was called Foſſa Mariana. He dug a large canal, into which he turned the waters of the Rhone, and thereby opened a new communication between his camp and the ſea. Through this canal the largeſt tranſports could paſs; by which means he ſupplied his army with plenty of proviſions; and, being encamped between the two arms of the river and the ſea, had no reaſon to fear the attacks of the enemy. Some writers pretend, that the name of Camargue, which the neighbouring diſtrict bears, is a corruption of Caſtra Marii, that is, the camp of Marius. Be that as it will, Marius had ſcarce finiſhed his works, when the barbarians appeared, covering with their innumerable multitudes a vaſt tract of land. They advanced to his trenches, but finding they could not force them, they made frightful ſhouts, and challenged the Romans to come out and fight them, but Marius was not in haſte to venture a battle, there being ſomething inexpreſſibly fierce in the looks of thoſe barbarians, which ſtruck the Romans with terror. The conſul therefore, that their countenances, out-cries, and the clatter of their arms might become the leſs terrible by being familiar to his men, ordered his troops to mount the ramparts, as often as the barbarians appeared. He likewiſe ſent out detachments, under the conduct of brave and experienced officers, to lay Foſſa Mariana.

waſte

waſte the country, and by that means diſtreſs the numberleſs barbarians for want of proviſions. The more the ſcarcity encreaſed, the more earneſt they were to come to a deciſive battle, inſulting the Romans in their camp. But their inſults only affected the common ſoldiers, whoſe ardor Marius reſtrained, telling them, that all raſhneſs was to be laid aſide, and no hazards to be run upon any account whatſoever. But this ſerved only to make the legionaries more impatient to come to a battle with the barbarians, whom they now began to deſpiſe, obſerving to one another, that ſhouts and outcries do no execution, that ghaſtly looks and a ſavage mein can only frighten cowards, and that well-diſciplined troops will always have the advantage over a diſorderly and ill-conducted multitude. Theſe ſentiments gave the conſul great pleaſure; but, being reſolved to hazard nothing, when all other means failed him, he had recourſe to ſuperſtition to keep his ſoldiers in a more ready obedience. His wife Julia, who was of the family of the Cæſars, had ſent him a woman from Rome, by name Martha, whoſe ſkill in predictions, ſhe ſaid, ſhe had experienced. The conſul received and treated her with the moſt profound reſpect, as if ſhe had been entruſted with the ſecrets of fate. But, in reality, ſhe was rather an interpreter of the will of Marius, than of the gods; he informed her of his deſigns, and the pretended propheteſs never failed to approve of the meaſures which the conſul had before reſolved on. Having conſulted her, whether he ſhould humour his ſoldiers and engage the enemy, Martha anſwered, that in the preſent circumſtances an engagement would prove fatal to the republic. This anſwer quieted the troops, and kept them in an entire ſubjection to their general. As the Teutones were continually hovering about the camp and inſulting the Romans, one of them, a man of gigantic ſize, advancing one day to the foot of the rampart, challenged the conſul himſelf to a ſingle combat. But Marius, without regarding his bravadoes, anſwered, if the German is in haſte to die, let him go and hang himſelf. At length the Teutones, quite tired out with Marius's delays, reſolved to attack the Roman camp, but not ſucceeding in the attempt, they decamped at length, with a deſign to force a paſſage over the Alps ſome other way. We are told, that they were ſix whole days, without intermiſſion, in paſſing by the Roman camp. In their march they cried out to the Romans upon the ramparts, If you have any meſſage to your wives, we will ſoon

Marius reſtrains the ardor of his ſoldiers.

The Teutones decamp.

ſoon deliver them at Rome. Marius, being forced to decamp likewiſe, followed the barbarians into the inner parts of the Roman province, and came up with them near Aquæ Sextiæ, now Aix. There the conſul thought it adviſeable to fortify a camp, that, at all events, he might be ſure of a retreat. But while his troops were employed in this work, the ſervants of the army, who were gone in crouds to fetch water from the Cenus, now the Arque, were attacked by a body of Teutones, who guarded that river. As the ſervants made a great outcry, ſome of the legionaries ran to their aſſiſtance. Hereupon the whole army of the enemy took arms, which obliged Marius to draw up his troops in battalia. The legions halted at ſome diſtance from the river, while the Ligurians advanced to begin the action. The Ambrones, to the number of thirty thouſand, faced the Ligurians in good order, and briſkly marched up againſt them, beating time on their bucklers, and crying out Ambrones! Ambrones! probably to encourage each other, or to intimidate the Romans, by a name which the defeat of Cæpio and Mallius had made formidable; for to the Ambrones chiefly was owing the total overthrow of thoſe two generals. The Ligurians were put to the rout at the firſt onſet. But when the legions came to engage, the face of affairs was changed. The undiſciplined multitude of barbarians, not being able to ſtand the ſhock of regular troops, were repulſed in their turn, and driven to the banks of the river, where the Romans made a dreadful ſlaughter of them. The river was ſtained with their blood, and only a ſmall number of them gained the oppoſite bank, whence they fled, being cloſely purſued by the victorious legions, to a kind of fortification, which they had made with their carts. Their wives, who had ſtaid there during the engagement, ſeeing their huſbands flying and the Romans at their heels, armed themſelves with axes, and, gnaſhing their teeth, fell with great ſhrieks on the purſued and purſuers without diſtinction. Without any regard to their own defence, they threw themſelves upon the combatants, ſeized their ſwords, and endeavoured to ſnatch away their bucklers. But when their firſt rage was ſpent, they deſired to capitulate upon this ſingle condition, that their honour ſhould be preſerved. When this condition was denied, thoſe unfortunate women, being reduced to deſpair, firſt killed their children, and then themſelves, not one remaining alive out of ſo great great a multitude. So remarkable was the love of chaſtity, which remained among thoſe whom the Romans called barbarians, after it was extinguiſhed at Rome [b].

A battle between the Romans and Ambrones.

The Ambrones defeated.

HOWEVER, this victory was far from being complete. The Ambrones indeed were defeated; but the Teutones, who were encamped at ſome diſtance from the river, ſtill remained. They did not ſtir all that night nor the next day; ſo that the Romans had time to fortify themſelves on the eminence which their general had firſt choſen. The third day after the battle, Teutobocchus, or, as others call him, Teutobodus, general of the Teutonic army, drew up his troops in the plain. On the other hand, Marius, having formed his infantry on the declivity of the hill, ordered his cavalry to go down the hill, attack the barbarians briſkly, and by a feigned flight draw them towards the eminence. The ſtratagem ſucceeded. The Teutones, impatient to come to an engagement, advanced in good order to the foot of the hill, and, notwithſtanding the diſadvantage of the ground, attacked the Romans with intrepidity. They ſtood the ſhowers of darts which the enemy diſcharged upon them, and, tho' forced to climb, cloſed with the legionaries in ſpite of all oppoſition, and fell upon them ſword in hand. The Romans, who were poſted on the declivity of the hill, by only puſhing the aggreſſors back with their bucklers, often tumbled them over one another. Beſides the ſun ſhone with great ſtrength, and full in their faces. But, notwithſtanding theſe diſadvantages, they kept the victory doubtful till noon. The night before the battle Marius had detached Claudius Marcellus with a body of infantry, and given him, inſtead of cavalry, the ſervants of the army, mounted, without ſaddles, on all the beaſts of burden he could find. They were ordered to lie in ambuſh in the hollow road behind the enemies camp, and to fall upon them in the heat of the action. Though the detachment was ſmall, yet the great number of ſervants, thus oddly mounted, gave it the appearance of a great army. The Teutones, who had hitherto behaved with great intrepidity, no ſooner ſaw this detachment advancing to attack them in the rear, than, their courage and ſtrength failing them at once, they betook themſelves to a diſorderly flight. The Romans, who in a manner ſurrounded them, made a dreadful ſlaughter of the fugitives, tives, took their camp and plundered it. Teutobocchus was, according to ſome, made priſoner; according to others, killed in the battle (L). As to the numbers of the ſlain and the priſoners in the two battles, they amounted, according to ſome writers, to two hundred and ninety thouſand; according to the loweſt calculations an hundred thouſand were killed on the ſpot. The dead were ſo numerous, as ſome writers tell us, that the inhabitants made fences for their vineyards with their bones; they add, that the field of battle was ſo enriched by the bodies buried there, that the Marſeilleſe, to whom it belonged, had the next year a much more plentiful crop from it than uſual [c].

The Teutones attack the Romans.

[b] Plut. in Mario. Front. ſtrat. l. iv. c. 7. & l. v. c. 11. Val. Max. l. vi. c. 1. Oroſ. l. v. c. 15.

The Teutones defeated with great ſlaughter. Year after the Flood, 2902. Before Chriſt, 97. Of Rome 651.

WITH the joyful news of this victory, Marius diſpatched a meſſenger to Rome; where the people were ſo tranſported with it, that, in gratitude, they advanced him to the conſulate the fifth time. While the people of Rome were heaping honours on their deliverer, the ſoldiers in the camp offered him all the booty. But he generouſly reſerved only what might grace his triumph, and dedicated the reſt to the gods. All the combuſtible things were gathered together in one pile, to which the conſul himſelf, with great ſolemnity, ſet fire. In the mean time, meſſengers arrived from Rome, with the congratulations of the people and the news of his fifth election, preſenting him at the ſame time with a decree of the ſenate, which gave him leave to triumph. Marius accepted theſe new honours with gratitude, and without betraying any extraordinary joy, I accept the conſulate, ſaid he, as a new obligation upon me to con-

Marius choſen conſul the fifth time.

quer

[c] Vell. Patercul. Oroſ. Eutrop. Liv. ibid. Flor. l. iii. Auth. de vir illuſtr. Plut. in Mario.

(L) Honorius Bouche in his hiſtory of Provence tells us, that near the village of Tretz was found a ſtone which preſerved the name of Teutobocchus; whence that writer infers, that he was killed in the battle, and buried near the above-mentioned village. M. de Peireſc ſpeaks of a brick ſepulchre diſcovered in 1613 near the conflux of the Rhone and the Iſere. It was thirty foot long, twelve broad, and eight high, with this inſcription on a large ſtone; Teutobocchus Rex. But Florus tells us in expreſs terms, that Teutobocchus was taken priſoner, and by Marius carried to Rome, where he graced the victor's triumph. That author adds, that his head reached above the trophies, which were carried before the triumphal chariot (8).

(8) Flor. l. iii.

quer the Cimbri, as I have the Teutones. As for a triumph, I deſire it may not be mentioned till I have made my victory complete. The pomp of a triumph will be very unſeaſonable, ſo long as there ſhall remain any barbarians in the neighbourhood of Italy. The collegue given Marius was Manius Aquilius, of whom hereafter. As for Catulus, he was continued in the command of the army with the title of proconſul. This new year was begun with acts of religion, which the people thought the more neceſſary, becauſe two enormous crimes were now committed, which had never been heard off ſince the foundation of the city. An unnatural ſon, by name Publicius Malleolus, killed his mother; a crime for which the Roman legiſlators had appointed no puniſhment, not preſuming it poſſible for a man to be guilty of ſo enormous a villainy; a new puniſhment was therefore allotted for this new crime. The parricide was ſewn up in a leathern ſack, and with a thouſand execrations thrown into the Tiber. The other crime was that of mutilation. A ſlave mutilated himſelf in imitation of the prieſts of Cybele. But the ſenate, apprehenſive of the conſequences of ſo dangerous a deluſion, baniſhed the eunuch for ever from Rome [d].

Parricide and mutilation puniſhed at Rome.

The Cimbri enter Italy.

In the mean time, Catulus, not being able to withſtand the numberleſs multitudes of the Cimbri, by the advice of Sylla, who ſerved under him in quality of his lieutenant-general, retired before the barbarians, and pitched two camps on the oppoſite banks of the Atheſis, now the Adige, intending there to make a ſtand againſt them. The Cimbri entered Italy, and advancing to the Atheſis, with a deſign to attack the Romans, attempted firſt to ford that river; but finding it not fordable, they pulled up great trees by the roots, and threw huge ſtones into it, hoping by that means ſo to fill it up as to make it paſſable. The terrible appearance of the numberleſs multitudes of the barbarians ſtruck the Romans with ſuch a panic, that it was not in the power of Catulus to hinder thoſe in his larger camp from flying ſhamefully before the enemy. Some of the Roman knights rid full ſpeed to Rome, leaving their general and fellow-ſoldiers to the mercy of the enemy. Among theſe was the ſon of Scaurus, prince of the ſenate; but, as ſoon as his father was informed of his cowardly deſertion, he ſent him orders never never to appear again in his preſence. Hereupon the young Roman, who had been afraid of dying honourably in the field of battle, fell ingloriouſly by his own hand. In the mean time, thoſe in the little camp made a vigorous reſiſtance. One of the Cimbri having challenged to a ſingle combat the braveſt men among them, was ſhamefully overcome by L. Opimius. But the example of this brave man was not ſufficient to encourage all the officers. There was in the camp but one legion, commanded by ſix tribunes, of whom five were for attempting to break through the enemy; but the ſixth, not ſo reſolute as the reſt, oppoſed ſo dangerous an attempt. Whereupon a centurion, named Petreius, ſtabbed the cowardly officer, and being choſen commander by the legion, obtained an honourable capitulation, led his ſmall body to a place of ſafety, and from thence marched to join the main body of the army encamped on the banks of the Po. Had the Cimbri known how to improve their victory, they might have made themſelves maſters of Rome, which was then quite defenceleſs, all orders of men being in the utmoſt conſternation. But they delayed in expectation of the coming up of the Teutones, and thereby gave the Romans time to recall Marius and his troops from Gaul. By order of the ſenate he joined his troops to the proconſul's army on the Po, and upon their union was declared commander in chief, his conſulate and reputation giving him a ſuperiority over Catulus. However, he received here a ſenſible mortification from his old lieutenant Sylla. That brave officer had, by a ſuperior conduct found means to ſupply the camp of Catulus with great plenty of proviſions, while Marius's men wanted even neceſſaries. Sylla therefore went to the conſul's camp, and maliciouſly offered to relieve his troops in their diſtreſs, with the overplus of the proviſions which he had amaſſed in the proconſul's camp. Neceſſity obliged Marius to accept the offer; but never was preſent received with more reluctance[c]. From this time Sylla entered into an open competition with Marius, notwithſtanding the ſuperiority which five conſulates gave him, over a man who had not yet been raiſed to any of the great employments of the republic.

And ſtrike the Romans with a panic.

[d] Jul. Obſeq. c. 100. Diodor. Sicul. ecl. l. xxxvi.

Marius ſent againſt the Cimbri.

In the mean time, the Cimbri, finding the Teutones did not appear, reſolved to come to action without them. But that they might act with ſome appearance of juſtice, they [c] Plut in Sylla.

they firſt ſent a deputation to the Roman general, deſiring him to aſſign them and their allies the Teutones, lands in the country where they were, and threatening, in caſe of a refuſal, to make the Romans feel the weight of their arms. Marius anſwered ſternly, You aſk lands for your allies the Teutones; I have given them ſome already. Their carcaſſes are now rotting in the fields by the Cenus, and their bones made uſe of for fences to the vineyards. The deputies, exaſperated at this ſevere jeſt, threatened to make him repent of his inſults, as ſoon as the Teutones ſhould paſs the Alps. You need not then delay a moment, anſwered Marius; they have already paſſed the Alps, and you ſhall immediately ſee them. Then ſhewing them the chiefs of the Teutonic army in chains; Pray ſalute your allies, ſaid he, to the deputies with a ſneer, and make yourſelves ready to come and join them. Theſe inſults provoked the Cimbri to ſuch a degree, that Bojorix, one of their kings, came in perſon to Marius's camp, and challenged him to fix the day and place of battle. This the Romans had ſcarce ever done; but Marius pitched upon the plain of Vercellæ, which was not large enough to contain half the enemy's force, As for the day, he named the eve of the calends of Auguſt, the third day from that time. Both generals kept their agreement. The army of Catulus amounted to twenty thouſand three hundred, and that of Marius to thirty-two thouſand. The enemy's cavalry were no more than fifteen thouſand; but their infantry ſeemed innumerable; for we are told, that they covered, when drawn up in a ſquare, thirty furlongs. Marius, as commander in chief, drew up the whole army; and, in order to deprive the proconſul of any ſhare of the glory of the day, he poſted his troops in the centre, and his own in the two wings, which projected before the main body, and muſt conſequently ſuſtain the efforts of the enemy's army. But his meaſures were diſconcerted by an unforeſeen accident. For, before the action began, the cavalry of the Cimbri made a motion, as if they intended to wheel about and flank the Roman army. Hereupon Marius, at the head of the two wings, advanced againſt them. The Cimbrian horſe at his approach retired, and drew the conſul after them. When he was at ſome diſtance from the main body, the enemy's infantry charged the legions commanded by Catulus and Sylla with incredible fury. The Romans, animated mated by the example of their leaders, ſtood the ſhock without giving ground, keeping themſelves upon the defenſive till the enemy's firſt fury was ſpent. When they found their ſtrength began to fail them, the legionaries charged them in their turn. As the ſun ſhone with great violence, thoſe northern people, not accuſtomed to the heats of Italy, were ſoon covered with ſweat, and ſcarce able to lift up their arms to ſtrike a blow; ſo that they made but a faint reſiſtance. They were ſoon overcome; but they had put it out of their own power to ſave themſelves from the victorious enemy by flight. That they might keep their ranks the better, they had, like true barbarians, tied themſelves to one another with cords faſtened to their belts; ſo that the Romans made what havock they pleaſed of thoſe helpleſs barbarians. To complete their misfortune, Marius, returning with his troops from the purſuit of the cavalry, fell upon them, when quite exhauſted with fatigue and the heat of the day. All that followed was a dreadful butchery, the whole plain being covered with dead bodies. From the field of battle the Romans marched to the enemy's camp, where they had a new battle to fight with their wives, who were even more fierce than their huſbands. From their carts and waggons, which formed a kind of fortification, they diſcharged ſhowers of darts on their friends and enemies without diſtinction. Then they firſt ſuffocated their children in their arms, and afterwards killed themſelves. The greateſt part hanged themſelves on trees. One was found hanging from a cart with two of her children at her heels. Many of the men, for want of trees and ſtakes, tied ſtrings in running knots about their necks, and faſtened them to the tails of their horſes, and the horns and feet of their oxen, to ſtrangle themſelves that way. Thus thoſe unhappy creatures put an end to their lives by all the methods they could contrive. Two of their kings or leaders ſtabbed each other. Bojorix and Luig, their chief commanders, died in the action ſword in hand. Clodic and Seſorix, two of their generals, were made priſoners with ſixty thouſand of their men, who were all put in chains, and ſold to the beſt bidder: an hundred and twenty thouſand of the barbarians were left dead upon the ſpot; whereas the Romans had ſcarce three hundred miſſing in both armies. Thus was this whole nation almoſt extirpated, whoſe incurſions and robberies were looked upon as a public ſcourge. After the battle,

The Cimbri provoked by Marius.

An engagement between the Romans and the Cimbri.

The Cimbri entirely defeated by Marius and Catulus.

all the ſpoils and enſigns were brought to the camp of Catulus, which was a plain declaration, that the victory was chiefly owing to his men. But hereupon a diſpute ariſing between the ſoldiers of the two camps, the generals agreed to refer the matter to the arbitration of the embaſſadors of Parma, who happened at that time to be in the army. Theſe being led to the field of battle, found almoſt all the darts, with which the barbarians had been killed, marked with the name of Catulus, who had taken care to imprint it on the arms of his ſoldiers before the battle. Beſides, Marius's men had taken from the enemy only two ſtandards; whereas Sylla brought to the proconſul's camp thirty-one, with the brazen bull, which the Cimbri worſhipped. Upon the whole, the arbitrators gave ſentence in favour of Catulus; ſo that Sylla ſaw with pleaſure the greateſt part of the glory of the action taken from Marius, who had endeavoured to ingroſs it all to himſelf. However, when the news of this ſignal victory was brought to Rome, the people gave all the honour of it to Marius, calling him the third founder of Rome, the deliverer of his country; nay, they even invoked him as a god; and neither time, nor the moſt circumſtantial accounts, could undeceive them, ſo as to bring them to allow any ſhare of the ſucceſs to Catulus. But Marius himſelf had not the confidence to deprive Catulus of the glory which was due to him. Beſides, he was afraid that the army of Catulus would oppoſe his triumph, if he pretended to exclude their general. They were therefore both honoured with a triumph. The ſpoils taken from the enemy were carried before the triumphant victors; but, if we give credit to Florus [f], no part of the ſhew ſtruck the people ſo much as the ſight of king Teutobocchus, who was, according to that writer, of ſuch a gigantic ſtature, that his head appeared above the trophies which were carried in proceſſion. After the triumph, both generals, purſuant to a vow each of them had made, built a temple in memory of their victory: Marius, who had no taſte for arts, in a very plain manner, to virtue and honour; and Catulus, with great elegance and beauty, to the fortune of this day. Marius, on the day his temple was dedicated, entertained the people with games after the Greek manner; but, as we

The victory chiefly owing to Catulus's men.

The victory aſcribed at Rome to Marius alone.

Both build temples in memory of their victory.

[f] Flor. l. iii. c. 3.

was his element, he was immediately tired with them, and withdrew [g].

THUS was Italy delivered from her fears by the defeat of the Teutones and Cimbri. The only enemy the Romans had now to contend with were the rebellious ſlaves in Sicily. The republic had ſent againſt them, two years before the defeat of the Cimbri, the prætor Lucius Licinius Lucullus with an army of fourteen thouſand men, legionaries and auxiliaries, excluſive of the ſuccours that were ſent him from Greece and Lucania. As ſoon as the Roman army landed, Salvius, who had ſhut up Athenio in the citadel of Triocala, as we have related above, delivered him from his confinement, and adviſed with him, as he was a man of ſome experience, about the means of reſiſting the new general. In a council of war, which they held, it was agreed, that Salvius ſhould continue in the city of Triocala to defend it, if attacked, and that Athenio ſhould, at the head of forty thouſand men, march againſt Lucullus, and give him battle. Accordingly Athenio marched with his army into the neighbourhood of Scirtæum, and there came to an engagement with the prætor, in which the victory was warmly diſputed. The ſlaves, who for the moſt part had ſerved in war before they were reduced to ſlavery, fought with a regularity and courage which the Romans did not expect; inſomuch, that the ſucceſs would have been doubtful, if Athenio, advancing into the middle of the enemy's battalions at the head of three hundred horſe, had not been wounded in both his knees. He fell from his horſe through faintneſs, and was covered with an heap of dead bodies. Hereupon his troops, having no commander of reputation to head them, diſperſed and fled in the utmoſt confuſion. The Romans purſued the fugitives, and killed above twenty thouſand of them. The news of this defeat no ſooner reached Triocala, than the cowardly Salvius abandoned the place. But, in the mean time, Athenio, having got from under the dead bodies that covered him, gained Triocala with the remains of his army, before the prætor, who ſpent nine days in uſeleſs precautions, inveſted the place. Athenio ſuſtained the ſiege with an intrepidity ſeldom found in men of his rank, and forced Lucullus to raiſe the ſiege, and retire from before the place, amidſt the hiſſes of the ſlaves, who inſulted him and his army from their walls, as they filed off. He withdrew to War with the ſlaves.

Licinius defeats the ſlaves in Sicily.

But is forced to raiſe the ſiege of Triocala.

[g] Plut. in Mario & Sylla. Val. Max. l. v. c. 7.

Syracuſe, and there ſpent the remainder of the year, wholly intent on enriching himſelf at the expence of his province. His year was therefore no ſooner expired, than he was recalled, and being accuſed before the people of oppreſſion, he was condemned to baniſhment [h]. The prætor C. Servilius was ſent to ſucceed him; but that weak general was even more unfortunate than his predeceſſor.

C. Servilius defeated by the ſlaves.

Athenio, who now carried on the rebellion alone, Salvius being dead, attacked the Roman army, gave them a total overthrow, and made himſelf maſter of their camp. After this victory Athenio advanced to Meſſana, and having made a fruitleſs attempt upon that city, beſieged Macella and took it. The progreſs of the rebellion opened at length the eyes of the ſenate, who ſent Manius Aquilius, the colleague of Marius for the preſent year, to ſuppreſs it. Aquilius croſſed over into Sicily with a conſular army, and having made it his whole buſineſs in his conſulſhip to reduce the rebels to great ſtreights for want of proviſions, in the year of his proconſulate he entirely deſtroyed them. He took the field, and brought the enemy to a battle, which both parties maintained with equal vigor, till the two generals met, and determined the victory by a ſingle combat.

The conſul Aquilius defeats the ſlaves, and puts an end to the war.

Aquilius not diſdaining to enter the liſts with Athenio, a ſtop was put to the battle, the Romans on one ſide, and the ſlaves on the other, making way for the two champions. The proconſul, who was a man of great ſtrength and reſolution, laid his adverſary dead on the ground at one blow; and the Romans, taking advantage of his victory, and the enemy's fears, fell upon them with freſh vigor, and made ſuch a ſlaughter of the diſheartened rebels, that of their vaſt army ſcarce ten thouſand eſcaped to their camp, where they choſe rather to kill one another than ſurrender. When they were reduced to a thouſand, one Satyrius capitulated with the proconſul, who promiſed him and his companions their lives, but afterwards ſent them to Rome to fight the wild beaſts in the ſhows of the circus. But they choſe rather to fall by each other's hands. And thus ended a rebellion, which laſted four years, and coſt the republic, according to ſome writers, near a million of ſlaves.

Is honoured with an ovation.

Aquilius on his return was honoured with an ovation, the republic having more regard to her antient cuſtom of not granting a triumph to the conquerors of rebels, bels, especially if they were slaves, than to the merit and services of Aquilius [i].

[h] Diodor. Sicul. eclog. 1. l. xxxvi.

The republic, after the defeat of the Cimbri and the reduction of the slaves, had scarce any enemies left abroad, but nourished such in her own bosom as proved more mischievous to her, than either the barbarians of Germany, or the slaves of Sicily. Marius, whose ambition knew no bounds, stood now for the sixth consulship, with as much eagerness as he had done for the first. Though naturally fierce and rough, he became mild and affable, caressed the meanest of the people, and ingratiated himself with them by the most servile condescensions. His competitor was the great Metellus, surnamed Numidicus, whose virtues and experience, joined to the wishes of all honest men, loudly called him to the government of the republic. But Marius, by distributing under-hand large sums among the people, got Metellus excluded, himself chosen, and one Lucius Valerius Flaccus, a very weak man, appointed for his collegue. The first step Marius took after his election was, to contract an intimate friendship with L. Apuleius Saturninus and Servilius Glaucia, two daring and factious men, who had all the scum of the indigent and seditious people constantly at their beck. Apuleius had been long devoted to the consul, and had procured him, as we have observed above, his fourth consulate. Glaucia was the prætor, to whom the cognizance of civil causes belonged, and was naturally factious and violent. These three entered into an association with a design to engross all the power to themselves. Apuleius had been once before tribune of the people, and now stood for that post a second time. But he had the misfortune to come in competition with A. Nonnius, a man of an unblemished character, and highly esteemed by the people. Marius used all his interest in behalf of his friend Apuleius; but both his intrigues and sollicitations were ineffectual: all the voices were for Nonnius, who was accordingly declared tribune. Hereupon Apuleius, giving himself wholly up to the dictates of his fury, caused Nonnius to be stabbed at the breaking up of the assembly, and then got himself tumultuously proclaimed tribune by those of his own party, before any considerable part of the people were assembled to give their suffrages. The consul confirmed the election; and the murder of Nonnius was no more mentioned.

The mean practices of Marius.

His sixth consulship.

Apuleius murders his competitor, and assumes the tribunate.

[i] Diodor. Sicul. l. xxxviii. eclog. 1. Flor. l. iii. c. 29. Cic. de orat. Liv. in epit.

Marius's aſſociation with him and Glaucia.

tioned. And now Marius, Apuleius, and Glaucia, formed a kind of triumvirate, whoſe whole aim was to humble the ſenate, and aſſume all power to themſelves. About this time embaſſadors arrived at Rome from Mithridates the Great, king of Pontus, ſent by their maſter to adjuſt ſome ſmall differences between him and the republic. Theſe Apuleius, at the inſtigation of Marius, uſed in a moſt bruti ſh manner. The conſul, in all likelihood, weary of an inactive life, hoped by that means to provoke Mithridates to begin a war. However that be, the embaſſadors laid their complaints before the ſenate, and the conſcript fathers, glad of an opportunity of humbling the inſolent tribune, cited him before their tribunal. But, on the day when ſentence was to be pronounced, the populace ſurrounded the hall where the ſenate met, in ſuch crouds, that they intimidated the judges; ſo that the factious tribune was acquitted by a majority of votes [k].

Apuleius revives the antient quarrel about the diſtribution of lands.

AFTER this victory over the ſenate, Apuleius, a tribune of the people, renewed the antient quarrel about the diviſion of the lands. Marius and Catulus had, by the defeat of the Cimbri, recovered ſome lands in Ciſalpine Gaul, of which thoſe barbarians had taken poſſeſſion; and Apuleius was for unjuſtly taking thoſe lands from the true owners, and giving them to Marius's ſoldiers, who were for the moſt part people without houſe or home, and entirely devoted to their general. In the law which he had prepared together with Marius, whoſe tool he was, for the diſtribution of the lands, there was a clauſe expreſsly providing, That the ſenate ſhould come and ſwear in full aſſembly to confirm whatever ſhould be enacted by the people, and not to oppoſe them in any thing; and that whoever refuſed to take that oath ſhould be degraded, and condemned to a fine of twenty talents. Nothing could be more unreaſonable than ſuch a law, ſince it ſubjected the ſenate to the people. On the day therefore of the comitia, when it was to be admitted or rejected, many men of great weight and authority mounted the roſtra to diſſuade the people from paſſing it. But they were pulled down by the mob of the country tribes, whom Marius and Apuleius had brought in great crouds into the city. Theſe violent proceedings provoked the city tribes, who, finding themſelves the weakeſt, that the aſſembly might be diſſolved, cried out, That they heard it thunder; which, according to the laws, obliged them to ſuſpend for that day day all deliberations. But the country tribes, having among them many veterans, moſt of them men of mettle, diſregarding that ſuperſtitious cuſtom, fell upon the city tribes, and, having driven them with ſtones and clubs out of the forum, got the law paſſed. The next day Marius, who was at the bottom of all this and the chief manager of the plot, as conſul, made a report to the ſenate of the law in queſtion, exclaimed againſt the late violences, and declared, for his part that he was determined never to take ſo unreaſonable an oath, and that he did not doubt, but every honeſt man would be of his opinion; for if the law was good in itſelf, there was no neceſſity for ſwearing; and if it was a bad one, they were all obliged in honour not to ſwear. This he ſaid to enſnare Metellus, whom he hated ever ſince their quarrel in Numidia. He hoped that his declaring againſt the oath would draw a like declaration from that great man, and did not doubt, but when he had once made ſuch a public declaration, he would ſtand firm to his reſolution, which would infallibly expoſe him to the hatred of the people. The event anſwered his expectation; Metellus proteſted, that he would not take the oath, and the whole ſenate did the ſame. A few days after, Apuleius ſummoned the ſenate to appear in the comitia in order to take the oath; and then Marius made his appearance among the reſt; and while the eyes of all the ſenators were fixed upon him, he, to their great ſurpriſe, declared, that he had changed his ſentiments: I am not ſo ſtiff and obſtinate, ſaid he, as to be tied down by any declaration I may have made upon an affair of ſo much weight, before I had thoroughly conſidered it; but am ready to ſwear, and having ſwore, will punctually obſerve the law, when it once becomes a law. Theſe laſt words he added, to put a plauſible colour upon his breach of faith. If it was a law, it ought without all doubt, to be obeyed. But this was a mean ſubterfuge and knaviſh pretence. It was no law, being without any of the requiſite conditions; and therefore, inſtead of obeying, he ought to have oppoſed it. The ſenators upon this declaration of Marius, which was applauded by all the country tribes, were afraid to open their mouths. Marius took their ſilence for a tacit conſent, and immediately went to the temple of Saturn, according to the antient cuſtom, and there took the oath, even without the reſtriction he himſelf had propoſed. The ſenators over-awed by the people, followed his example. But Metellus reſolutely perſiſted in his former opinion, notwithſtanding the repreſentations of his friends, who earneſtly entreated him to yield to the times. He told thoſe, who preſſed him to take the oath, that to do a baſe and unworthy action was under all circumſtances ſhameful; that to do well, when no danger attended it, was common; but to do well, in the midſt of dangers, was the property of a truly good and honeſt man. Upon his refuſal, the aſſembly, at the inſtigation of Marius and Apuleius, condemned him to baniſhment. The nobility, the whole body of the patricians and the city tribes, offered to oppoſe this moſt unjuſt decree of the populace. Many, out of affection for ſo good and virtuous a citizen, had brought arms under their robes, being determined to defend him to the laſt extremity. But that wiſe ſenator, who truly loved his country, after having, in a tender manner, returned them thanks for their kindneſs, declared, that he would not ſuffer a ſingle drop of blood to be ſpilt on his account. He then went into baniſhment, which in ſo glorious a cauſe did him more honour than all his victories or triumphs. He left the city with this wiſe reflection; Either the face of affairs will change, and the people repent what they have done; in which caſe I ſhall be recalled and reſtored with honour: or they will remain in the preſent poſture; and then it will be beſt for me to be at a diſtance from Rome. The illuſtrious exile went to reſide, ſome ſay at Rhodes, others at Smyrna, where, in a ſweet tranquillity, he gave himſelf entirely up to the ſtudy of philoſophy, enjoying in his retreat thoſe pleaſures which flow from a good conſcience [1].

[k] Diodor. Sicul. apud Ful. Urſin.

Marius's treachery and double dealing.

Metellus condemned to baniſhment.

Marius, Apuleius, and Glaucia congratulated each other on their having at laſt ruined their common enemy. The point Apuleius had in view was, to get himſelf continued in the tribuneſhip, Glaucia aſpired at the conſulate, and Marius was for maintaining himſelf in his poſt another year. To compaſs their ends, they ſcrupled nothing. Apuleius, like a monſter let looſe, committed the moſt flagrant acts of violence and injuſtice with impunity. Marius, who was the ſoul of the plot, left to the other two the execution of the wicked ſchemes which he adviſed. He pretended to keep the balance even between the people and the ſenate. On one ſide, he raiſed diſturbances underhand, by means of his two confederates, in order to make himſelf neceſſary, and pave the way for his ſeventh conſulſhip. On the Diſturbances raiſed by Apuleius.

[1] Plut. in Mario. Cic. pro Sextio & Balba. Appian. de bell. civil. Auth. de vir illuſtr.

the other hand, he pretended a great desire to compose them, hoping thereby to ingratiate himself with the senate. By this artful conduct he would have gained his point, had not his deceit been discovered by an accident. One evening some senators came to wait on the consul, and to implore his assistance against the attempts of the seditious tribune. Marius, who was willing to keep fair with the nobility, received them very graciously, and promised to exert his power against Apuleius. While he was conferring with the senators about the proper measures for preserving the republic, Apuleius came to receive his directions about raising new disturbances, and being let in at a back door unknown to the senators, was carried into another apartment. Then Marius, pretending a looseness, under that colour, was continually running from one apartment to the other, exasperating the senators against the tribune, and the tribune against the senators. But this being soon after known, he became suspected by both parties. Apuleius and Glaucia began to take umbrage at his complaisance for the patricians; and the patricians grew jealous of his great intimacy with those two incendiaries. In the mean time, Apuleius and Glaucia canvassed, independently on the consul, the former for a third tribuneship, and the latter for the consulate; and both resolved to stick at nothing. Nay, Apuleius set up the contemptible Equitius, of whom we have spoke above, for tribune of the people, and, without any regard to common decency, carried matters so far, that Marius himself thought it adviseable to send Equitius to prison, ordering him to be kept there till the election of the tribunes was over. But Apuleius, having spirited up the people to break open the prison, set Equitius at liberty, and prevailed upon the turbulent populace to proclaim him tribune of the people. But the pretended tribune died before he entered upon his office. At the same time Glaucia, who stood for the consulate, carried his furious attempts to such excess, that he was become quite insupportable. When the comitia for the election of consuls came on, Marius was excluded, and the orator Marcus Antonius chosen in the first place; Glaucia expected to be nominated in the second; but finding he had a formidable competitor in Memmius, who was infinitely superior to him in all respects, and highly esteemed on account of his probity, he made no scruple to send one of his attendants to murder him in the open forum. After a murder so public and daring, Glaucia and Apuleius his accomplice, to avoid the punishment they deserved,

The violent proceedings of Apuleius and Glaucia.

Memmius murdered.

ſerved, openly attempted to deſtroy the republic itſelf. They carried a multitude of deſperate men to the houſe of Apuleius, who there exhorted them to an open rebellion. We are told, that they appointed him to be their general, and offered him the title of king, which he is ſaid to have accepted. But be that as it will, it was now an open conſpiracy; the ſenate declared them enemies to their country, and paſſed one of thoſe decrees, which were never made, but in times of the utmoſt difficulty and danger: the two conſuls Marius and Flaccus were ordered to provide for the public welfare in what manner they judged proper; which was impowering them to revenge with the ſword the diſturbances thoſe ſeditious men were raiſing in the republic. Hereupon Marius found himſelf obliged to arm, in order to ſuppreſs a ſedition which he ſecretly favoured, but could protect no longer. No time was to be loſt: Glaucia and Apuleius had already ſeized the capitol. Arms therefore were given to all thoſe who declared for the ſenate; the knights, the ſenators, and all who had the welfare of their country at heart, armed themſelves againſt the two rebels. But Marius affected delays, and plainly ſhewed it was much againſt his inclination that he obeyed the orders of the ſenate. In the mean time, the whole rabble of the country tribes entered the city with a deſign to join their friends in the capitol, but were obliged to fight a battle in the forum before they could reach the citadel. When they were hard preſſed, Apuleius made a ſally, and covered their retreat to the capitol. During the action, the ſeditious tribune hoiſted up a cap on the top of a lance to invite the ſlaves to take arms in his favour in hopes of their liberty. In the mean time, the ſenators and knights, tired with the delays of Marius, who was ever pleading ſome excuſe or other, cauſed the pipes to be cut, which conveyed water into the capitol, which ſoon reduced the rioters to a deſperate condition. In this extremity Suffeius, one of their leaders, was for ſetting fire to the temple of Jupiter, in hopes they ſhould make their eſcape, during the confuſion and tumult which commonly attend ſuch accidents. But Apuleius and Glaucia, depending upon their friendſhip with Marius, ſurrendered to him, after he had promiſed, upon the public faith, to ſave their lives. This promiſe was in itſelf void and unlawful, ſince the ſenate had already declared them rebels, and ordered the conſul to declare them as ſuch. But Marius was reſolved to ſave a body of deſperate men, whoſe fury might be of uſe

Apuleius and Glaucia openly rebel.

And ſeize the capitol.

A battle in the forum.

The rebels in the capitol forced to ſurrender to Marius.

uſe to him on ſome other occaſion. He therefore gave them leave to march out of the capitol unmoleſted. Glaucia retired to the houſe of one Claudius for refuge; but the people ſoon dragged him from thence, and cut off his head. His brother Dolabella and one L. Geganius, who retired to the herb-market, were murdered there. Hereupon Marius ſhut up the reſt, with Apuleius their chief, in the old palace of Tullus Hoſtilius, giving out, that he confined them there in order to bring them to condign puniſhment. But the palace was in reality a place of ſafety for them, rather than a priſon; and the guards, placed at the gates, were not ſo much to prevent their making their eſcape, as to ſecure them againſt the inſults of the people. Of this the ſenators and knights were well appriſed; and therefore having aſſembled the people, they diſperſed the guards, broke open the gates of the palace, and with clubs and ſtones diſpatched Suffeius, Labienus, Equitius, Apuleius himſelf, and all the leading men of his party. The people not ſatisfied with the death of Apuleius, tore his body into a thouſand pieces. And now, the ſtorm being blown over, the comitia aſſembled in tranquillity, and all the acts of the preceding tribunate were declared abſolutely null, for want of liberty in the ſuffrages. After this the tribes met again to chuſe a collegue for Marcus Antonius, who had been elected on the day that Memmius was murdered. The perſon raiſed to that dignity was A. Poſthumius Albinus, a man of excellent parts and a ſincere friend to his country [m].

Who endeavours to ſave them;

But in vain.

THE new conſular year was begun with purifying the city, which had been polluted with ſo much blood in the late troubles. To the ceremonies uſed on this occaſion others ſucceeded for averting evils, foreboded by ſome imaginary prognoſtics. It was not then known, that in the year, when theſe prodigies were ſaid to have happened, a child was born in Rome, who would one day overturn the republic. This was Julius Cæſar, who came into the world on the twelfth day of the month Quintilis, in the ſixth conſulate of Marius, whence the fifth month of the old Roman year was called Julius. The new conſuls had the pleaſure to ſee the games, which P. Claudius Pulcher the ædile gave, celebrated without trouble or confuſion. They were the moſt ſplendid that had had yet been ſeen in Rome. We are told that Claudius was the firſt who cauſed the ſcenes to be painted; which was ſo artfully done, ſays Pliny [n], that the birds atempted to alight on the tops of the houſes, and to perch on the trees, which were painted on the cloth. Thus were the firſt months of this year ſpent in tranquillity. But it was not long, ere the leaven of ſedition, which Marius had ſown among the tribunes, began to ſhew itſelf in Sextius Titius, who attempted to ingratiate himſelf with the people, and raiſe new troubles, by reviving the Gracchian law about the diviſion of lands. But the conſul M. Antonius prevented the miſchief he intended, and brought him into ſuch contempt, that, as ſoon as he was out of his office, he was accuſed of the moſt infamous and unnatural practices, and condemned to baniſhment. And now, after Marius and his adherents were thus fully diſappointed, it was thought a proper ſeaſon to recall the great Metellus. All the Cæcilian family, of which the Metelli were a branch, intereſted themſelves in the cauſe of their relation. The exile's ſon appeared in deep mourning, fell proſtrate before the tribes, and did all for the recalling of his father, which perſons accuſed of capital crimes uſed to do to ſave their own lives. This affectionate conduct towards his father procured him the ſurname of Pius, which he bore the reſt of his life. The whole body of the patricians joined with the ſon, and entreated the people in a public aſſembly to recall ſo worthy a citizen. Marius did all that lay in his power to prevent the return of a patrician, who was the ſupport of the ſenate, a true pattern of the old Roman probity, and the dread of the ſeditious. But, in ſpite of Marius's utmoſt efforts, equity prevailed, and the return of Metellus was carried by a majority of ſuffrages. The meſſenger ſent to acquaint him with the decree of the people, finding him at a public ſhow in the city of Trallis in Lydia, delivered to him the letter, and at the ſame time whiſpered him, that it contained joyful news. But the illuſtrious philoſopher, without the leaſt change of countenance, continued his attention to the ſhow, and did not open the packet till the games were ended. The ſame greatneſs of ſoul which had kept him from dejection in his diſgrace, guarded him againſt immoderate joy in his proſperity. All the perſons of diſtinction in Rome went to receive him at the gate of the Sextius Titius tribune of the people, baniſhed.

The birth of Julius Cæſar.

[m] Plut. in Mario. Appian. de bell. civil. l. i. Flor. l. iii. c. 16. Cic pro Sextio, Rabirio, &c. Val. Max. l. iii. c. 2.

Metellus recalled.

[n] Plin. l. xxxv. c. 7.

the city. He was accompanied from the gate to his own house by vast crowds of people, who testified the sincerity of their joy by loud acclamations. His house was crouded from morning to night with persons of all ranks, who came to see and congratulate him. In short, his return was a real triumph. Marius, to avoid the mortification of seeing a triumphant enemy, left Rome and went into Asia, giving out, that he was going to perform some sacrifices, which he had vowed to Cybele the mother of the gods. But the true motive of his voyage into Asia was, to kindle a war, and cut out new work for his republic there. He owed his grandeur wholly to arms, and could not maintain it in peaceable times, being destitute of those talents which were necessary to gain applause in a commonwealth, where eloquence bore a great sway in all public deliberations. In order therefore to have an opportunity of displaying anew his talent for war, he went to the court of Mithridates king of Pontus, who seemed the most disposed to quarrel. The king received him with all the honour due to his reputation, caressed him in the most affectionate manner, and did all that lay in his power to oblige a man of so much weight in his republic. But all to no purpose; he could draw nothing from the proud Roman, but insolent treatment. Marius did not doubt, but, if he could provoke that young, powerful, and brave king to take arms against Rome, he should have the command of the forces employed in that war; and therefore he treated him with great haughtiness and contempt. One day he addressed himself to him very bluntly in these terms; You must either, O king, endeavour to be more powerful than the Romans, or quietly submit to their will. The king of Pontus, the proudest prince of his time, was quite astonished at the discourse of the bold commonwealth's man. However, as he was a great politician, he did not think this a proper time to declare his resentments; and therefore, concealing his displeasure, he dismissed Marius loaded with presents [a].

Marius retires from Rome.

His insolent behaviour at the court of Mithridates.

But to return to Metellus, the people soon gave him a sensible proof of the regard they had for him. Upon his presenting to the tribes his relation Q. Cæcilius Metellus, the people very readily chose him consul, and gave him for his collegue T. Didius, who had been honoured with a triumph fourteen years before, for having defeated defeated the Scordiſci. The two conſuls drew lots for their provinces, when Italy fell to Metellus, and Spain to Didius, whither he carried a conſular army to make head againſt the Spaniſh rebels, who had taken arms in great numbers, and committed dreadful devaſtations in the Roman province. Under Didius ſerved Sertorius in quality of legionary tribune. He was a native of Nurſia in Sabinia, and had already given many proofs of his valour; but in the preſent war with the revolted Spaniards, he gained more reputation than his general. He reduced the cities of Caſtulo and Gyriſænium, two places of great importance; and it was chiefly owing to his maſterly conduct, that Didius overthrew in a pitched battle the Vaccæi, of whom he cut twenty thouſand in pieces. After the conſul had, by the help of his brave tribune, reduced the rebels, he ſtained his victory by an unheard-of piece of treachery and cruelty. One of the Roman generals had ſettled five years before a colony of Spaniards near the city of Colenda. Theſe, before they were brought to this new ſettlement, had committed robberies in ſeveral parts of Spain. Didius ſuſpecting, without any grounds, that they deſigned to return to their antient way of living, obliged them to quit the lands they were poſſeſſed of, and promiſed them thoſe of Colenda, which city he had juſt reduced after a nine months ſiege. The Spaniards, depending on the general's promiſe, came with their wives and children to the Roman camp, where, under pretence of accommodating them better, they were admitted within the intrenchments. When the cruel conſul had them thus in his power, he cauſed the whole multitude to be divided into three companies, placing the men in one, the women in another, and the children in the third. The poor people ſuſpected no treachery, till they heard the conſul order his legionaries to fall upon them, and put them all, without diſtinction, to the ſword. His orders were put in execution with the utmoſt barbarity, not one of thoſe unhappy wretches eſcaping. A moſt deteſtable piece of cruelty! but applauded at Rome. To ſuch a degree were the Romans degenerated from their antient probity! This maſſacre exaſperated the Celtiberians, who, taking arms, faced the conſular army in the open field, and came to a pitched battle with them, in which they fought like men in deſpair, till night parted the two armies. The loſs of the Romans was equal to theirs; but Didius by a ſtratagem made them believe believe they had been worſted. He ordered moſt of the bodies of the Romans, who had been ſlain, to be carried out of the field of battle in the night. The Celtiberians, when they came early next morning, according to their cuſtom, to bury their dead, were ſo terrified at ſeeing ſuch a number of their own men ſlain, and ſo few Romans, that they ſubmitted to Didius upon his own terms. Thus, partly by force and partly by artifice, the Roman general ſettled Hither Spain in peace, and returned five years after his conſulſhip to Rome, where his ſervices were rewarded with a triumph [P]. This ſame year the prætor Cornelius Dolabella gained conſiderable advantages over the revolted Luſitanians in Further Spain. Hiſtorians indeed have not given us any account of his exploits, but in the triumphal tables he is ſaid to have triumphed over the Luſitanians this preſent year.

[a] Plut. ibid.

Sertorius gains great reputation in Spain.

The cruelty of Didius in Spain.

The Celtiberians ſubmit to Didius.

In the mean time, the conſul Metellus maintained peace at home, and puniſhed with the utmoſt ſeverity all ſpeeches that tended to ſedition. C. Plautus Decianus, one of the prætors, was baniſhed for dropping, in a public ſpeech, ſome expreſſions in favour of the furious tribune Apuleius. The tribunes themſelves durſt no longer propoſe ſeditious laws, or attempt to raiſe diſturbances among the populace. The preſence of Metellus and the abſence of Marius equally contributed to the public tranquillity. In Aſia, that is, in the antient kingdom of Pergamus, the excellent proconſul Q. Mucius Scævola puniſhed the iniquity of the Roman knights or publicans in a very exemplary manner. He found them guilty of moſt enormous extortions, in raiſing and managing the revenues of the republic; and therefore, without any regard to the dignity or power of ſo formidable a body, he cauſed many of them to be publicly carried to priſon, and condemned a ſlave to be crucified, who had been the agent of an oppreſſive publican, and an accomplice in his maſter's knavery. He appointed men of integrity, and well verſed in money affairs, to examine the books of the publicans, and by this means reformed his province in leſs than nine months. On his departure the Aſiatics inſtituted a feſtival to perpetuate among them the memory of his virtues. This feſtival, which from him was called Mucia, did him more honour than a triumph. Many of the governors of the provinces followed the example of Mucius, and the ſenate charged the conſuls and prætors.

Mucius Scævola puniſhes the publicans in Aſia.

[P] Plut. in Sertorio. Appian. in Iberic. Front. ſtrat. l. v. c. 11.

prætors to do the ſame in their reſpective provinces; ſo that a ſtop was put for ſome time to the oppreſſions of the publicans, which had rendered the yoke of the republic inſupportable [q].

Marius diſregarded at Rome.

In the ſucceeding conſulate of Cn. Cornelius Lentulus and P. Licinius Craſſus, Marius returned from Aſia; and, ſoon after his arrival in Rome, he built himſelf a houſe cloſe by the forum, either to eaſe his clients, as he himſelf gave out, of the trouble of going far, or in hopes of having more numerous levees there, than in a diſtant part of the town. But he found, that his rough behaviour kept people from him where-ever he lived. His haughty manners were not becoming in a free ſtate, where every one thinks himſelf to be upon a level with the beſt, and where the great can gain and maintain friends only by an obliging behaviour and good offices. He met with the fate of moſt warriors, who live to a great age in peace. Their victories are forgot, and they, as Plutarch obſerves, if not recommended by civil virtues, are, like old ruſty weapons, laid aſide as quite uſeleſs. But nothing gave Marius ſo great uneaſineſs as to ſee his old rival Sylla aggrandiſe himſelf, as he thought, at his expence. Bocchus, king of Mauritania, after he had been declared an ally of the Roman people, dedicated in the capitol ſeveral trophies of Sylla's victories, and placed near them ſome golden ſtatues, repreſenting in what manner he had delivered Jugurtha into the hands of Sylla. Marius, diſtracted with rage, attempted to pull down a monument, which aſcribed to his rival all the glory of ſo memorable an event. Sylla, on the other hand, oppoſed him with all his credit. Every one took party according to his intereſt and inclination; ſo that the whole city was divided into two factions; but by the vigilance of the conſuls a ſtop was put to the ſedition, when it was juſt upon the point of breaking out. Cn. Domitius Ahenobarbus and C. Caſſius Longinus, the two ſucceeding conſuls, took more care to maintain peace and tranquillity at home, than to ſignaliſe themſelves by feats of arms abroad. During their adminiſtration, Rome enjoyed all the advantages of peace and plenty, and was ſo ſenſible of her happineſs, that ſhe preferred to the many warriors, who deſired to ſucceed them, men brought up in peaceable employments, viz. Licinius Craſſus, the famous orator, and Q. Mucius Scævola, a learned civilian. But

Is jealous of Sylla's glory.

these

[q] Diodor. Sicul. Valeſ. Cic. ad Attic. l. vi. & in Verr. act. 7.

theſe pacific conſuls ſowed, without deſign, the ſeeds of one of the moſt bloody wars that had ever broke out in the neighbourhood of Rome. They got a law paſſed, which obliged the allies, who lived in Rome and falſely pretended to the right of Roman citizenſhip, to return to their own homes. By the help of theſe intruders ſome ſeditious tribunes had ſown diſcord among the real citizens; whence it ſeemed but juſt, that thoſe ſtrangers ſhould be ſent home to their reſpective countries. Nevertheleſs this law, how juſt ſoever and equitable in itſelf, was ſo reſented by the people of the Italian provinces, that it afterwards gave birth to the war of the allies. The conſuls, after having paſſed this law, and drawn lots for their provinces, ſet out, the one for Tranſalpine, the other for Ciſalpine, Gaul. Scævola, to whom Tranſalpine Gaul had fallen, finding little to do in his province, returned to Rome, and generouſly diſbanded his army before his year expired, thinking it an unneceſſary burden to the republic. Cr[illegible]us, though he ſought for enemies, and ſearched into all the corners of the Alps for people to fight with, could find none, but a company of ſtrolling robbers, whom he defeated. Nevertheleſs, he demanded a triumph on his return; but his collegue, out of pure regard to equity, oppoſed it, declaring, that he would not ſuffer ſo great an honour to be depreciated and thrown away on ſuch ſlight advantages. The following conſulſhip of L. Domitius Ahenobarbus and Cœlius Caldus was as peaceable as the former. Cœlius was a new man (M), of no birth or merit,

Origin of the ſocial war.

(M) The diviſion of the Roman people into Nobiles, Novi, and Ignobiles, often occurs in hiſtory, and was taken from the right of expoſing publicly the images or ſtatues of their anceſtors; an honour only allowed to thoſe whoſe anceſtors or themſelves had bore ſome curule office, that is, had been curule ædile, cenſor, prætor, or conſul. He who could expoſe the pictures or ſtatues of his anceſtors was ſtyled Nobilis; he, who could only produce his own, was called Homo Novus; and he, who could neither expoſe his own, nor the pictures of any of his anceſtors, was termed Ignobilis. So that jus imaginis was much the ſame thing among the antient Romans, as the right of bearing a coat of arms among us. For a great while none but the patricians were Nobilis, they alone being raiſed to the curule offices. Hence in many places of Livy, Salluſt, and other antient writers, we find the word Nobilitas uſed for the patrician order. But in after-ages, rit, and ſurnamed Caldus from his warm temper; but he had no opportunity of raiſing any diſturbances, ſome of the chief nobility being at this time admitted into the college of tribunes. The conſulate of C. Valerius Flaccus and M. Herennius was remarkable for nothing, but the pompous ſhow of lions, with which Sylla entertained the people in the circus, and the unjuſt condemnation of P. Rutilius Rufus a conſular. Bocchus ſent Sylla an hundred lions, and with them ſome Mauritanian hunters, who were uſed to fight them. This was a pleaſing entertainment to the people, and the remembrance of it contributed afterwards as much towards Sylla's promotion to the conſulate, as either his reputation or exploits. P. Rutilius Rufus had attended Mucius Scævola into Aſia, and was thought the author of his ſevere reformation of the publicans. He was unjuſtly, and purely out of revenge, accuſed by that powerful body, and condemned to baniſhment. He retired to Smyrna, where he was ſo well pleaſed with the converſation of the Greek philoſophers, that he refuſed to return to Rome, when the people ſome years after annulled the decree of his baniſhment [r].

A pompous ſhew given by Sylla.

Rutilius Rufus unjuſtly baniſhed.

THE following year, when C. Claudius Pulcher and M. Perperna were conſuls, the ſenate ordered Sylla to carry back Ariobarzanes, king of Cappadocia, to his dominions, whence he had been driven by Tigranes king of Armenia. This Sylla effected, after having defeated Gordius, whom the Armenians had placed on the throne, as we have related at length in the hiſtory of Armenia. On this occaſion Sylla received an embaſſy from Arbaces king of Parthia, deſiring the friendſhip of the Roman people. The Roman general thought this one of the moſt fortunate occurrences of his life, and eſteemed it an happy omen, that he ſhould be the firſt Roman who was known to ſo warlike and powerful a people [s].

Embaſſadors from the king of Parthia to Sylla.

AT Rome, Cn. Domitius Ahenobarbus, one of the cenſors, accuſed his collegue L. Craſſus of exceſſive fondneſs for ages, when the plebeians were admitted to the curule offices, both they and their poſterity were honoured with the title of Nobiles (9).

[r] Val. Max. l. vi. c. 4. Vell. Patercul. l ii. Plut. in Sylla. Cic. in Brut. & pro Muræna. [s] Plut. in Sylla.

(9) Vide Sigon. de jur. civ. Rom. l. ii. c. 20.

for one of his murænæ. The favourite muræna was ſo tame that it would come to Craſſus at his call, and feed out of his hand. The grave cenſor was ſo fond of this fiſh, that he took pleaſure in adorning it with the richeſt jewels he had. When it died, he put himſelf in mourning, and erected a tomb for it. When Craſſus, who was for his eloquence, as Cicero tells us, the wonder of his age, came to ſpeak in his own defence, he was very ſatirical on his auſtere accuſer, and uttered his ironical jeſts with ſuch geſtures, as drew upon his collegue the laughter of the whole aſſembly. I have been guilty, ſaid he, of this enormous crime; I have, it is true, wept at the loſs of a favourite fiſh: but you, good Domitius, have bore the loſs of three wives without ſhedding a tear. However, the cenſors, notwithſtanding their quarrels, joined in many uſeful regulations. They drove out of Rome ſeveral maſters, who had opened ſchools, though no ways qualified for that important employment.

A Roman cenſor puts himſelf in mourning upon the death of a fiſh.

The ſocial war breaks out. Year after the flood, 2213. Before Chriſt, 86. Of Rome 662.

THE enſuing year, Sext. Julius Cæſar (N) and L. Marcius Philippus were raiſed to the conſulate. During their adminiſtration, M. Livius Druſus, tribune of the people, occaſioned, though undeſignedly, the breaking out of that unfortunate war, at the very gates of Rome, which hiſtorians ſometimes call the ſocial war, or the war of the allies, and ſometimes the Marſian war, becauſe it began in the country of the Marſi. Druſus was deſcended of an illuſtrious family, and had improved the great talents nature had given him, by the ſtudy of eloquence. He was a ſincere friend to his country, and therefore, with a view to the public welfare, he attempted to remedy thoſe diſorders which had been introduced into the adminiſtration. But his very remedies encreaſed them, and rendered the diſtempers of the republic incurable. Tho' there had been of late no open ſedition, he obſerved, that a general diſſatisfaction reigned in the three orders of men who made up the whole body of the commonwealth. The cognizance of civil cauſes had been, by one of C. Gracchus's laws, taken from the ſenate and given to the knights; and this the conſcript fathers could not bear, but inſiſted on their being reinſtated in their antient privileges. On the Druſus, tribune of the people, author of this war.

(N) This Sextius Julius Cæſar was uncle to the famous Julius Cæſar. His ſiſter Julia was wife to Marius according to Plutarch; and Suetonius tells us, that ſhe was aunt to Julius Cæſar, the firſt Roman emperor.

other hand, the knights would by no means part with a prerogative, which had been given them by a law paſſed in the comitia. The people murmured, becauſe the execution of the Gracchian law was neglected, and no care was taken to aſſign them lands; but the nobility refuſed to part with any of the lands they poſſeſſed. The Italian allies were no leſs diſſatisfied than the ſenate and people. They aſpired at the right of ſuffrage, and at the offices in the republic, which they had ſo much aſſiſted in her conqueſts. They remonſtrated, that they paid conſiderable taxes; that in the time of war their countries raiſed double the number of forces that were raiſed in Rome; that the commonwealth owed partly to their valour that prodigious power which ſhe had acquired; and laſtly, that it was but juſt they ſhould ſhare the honours of a ſtate which they had helped to aggrandize, both with their arms and treaſures.

His ſcheme to reconcile all orders of men.

Now Druſus formed a ſcheme to reconcile all orders of men, and put an end to all diſcontents, which, he foreſaw, would in proceſs of time, if not removed, produce a general inſurrection. A glorious deſign! but now impracticable. He began with endeavouring to reconcile the ſenators and knights, thinking he had found out an effectual expedient for gaining ſo important a point. He propoſed to reſtore to the ſenate the cognizance of civil cauſes, which had been conferred on the knights, and to make that ſecond order amends, by admitting three hundred of them into the ſenate. But this ſcheme was no ſooner propoſed, than both the bodies, which he deſigned to reconcile, declared againſt it with great vehemence. The ſe-

Is oppoſed with great warmth.

nators ſcorned to admit into their body ſuch a number of men far inferior to them in birth, which they ſaid, would depreciate the ſenatorial dignity. On the other hand, ſuch of the knights, as had reaſon to fear they ſhould not be in the number of the three hundred deſigned for ſenators, declared, that they would not by any means, or for any equivalent whatſoever, ſuffer their order to be deprived of a juriſdiction, which made them very conſiderable in Rome. Q. Servilius Cæpio put himſelf at the head of the knights, and the conſul Marcius Philippus appeared for the ſenate, to oppoſe the deſigned accommodation. Philippus, who was a man of a warm and fiery temper, had the boldneſs to interrupt the tribune Druſus, while he was one day haranguing the people from the roſtra, and to command him ſilence. Hereupon one of the tribune's officers collaring the conſul, handled him ſo roughly, that the blood guſhed out of his noſe. After this Druſus, who had the people on his ſide, ordered the conſul to be carried to priſon, for attempting to interrupt a tribune in the exerciſe of his authority. The tribune finding his well-meant ſcheme oppoſed, with great warmth, both by the knights and ſenators, to ingratiate himſelf with the people, propoſed a law for diſtributing gratis among the poor what bread they wanted. He repreſented, that there was no danger of the treaſury's being exhauſted by this bounty, ſince immenſe ſums were annually brought into it from the provinces; that there were at that time lodged in the temple of Saturn, where the public treaſures were kept, 1620829 pounds weight of gold; that the public treaſury ought not to be like the ſea, which ſwallows up every thing and returns nothing, &c. The law met with great oppoſition, but at length paſſed to the univerſal ſatisfaction of the indigent citizens. In the next place, Druſus made it his buſineſs to gain the affections of the Italian allies, eſpecially of the Latins. In order to this, he propoſed a law for inveſting them with all the privileges of Roman citizens. But this law was oppoſed with great violence, not only by the ſenators and knights, but even by the people, who could not bear the thoughts of making thoſe their fellow-citizens, whom they looked upon as their ſubjects. In the mean time, the Italian allies flocked to Rome from all parts to ſupport their protector. But, finding they could not by his means gain their point, they entered into a plot, without his knowledge, to extort by force what they deſpaired of getting by intereſt. Some of the leading men among them formed a deſign of aſſaſſinating the conſuls, during the ceremony of the Feriæ Latinæ, which was annually performed on the hill of Alba after the election of the great magiſtrates. But Druſus being informed of the plot, notwithſtanding all the care the conſpirators took to conceal it, he immediately acquainted the conſuls with the wicked deſigns of the allies, and by that means ſaved their lives. But thoſe, whom the well-meaning tribune had ſaved from a conſpiracy, conſpired to deſtroy him. While he was one day returning from the forum, where he had harangued the people in behalf of the allies, a great crowd of people attended him to the door of his houſe, where he was ſtabbed with a knife, which the ruffian left in the wound, and then made his eſcape. When Druſus felt himſelf wounded, he cried out, Ungrateful republic! Wilt thou ever find a man more zealous for thy true intereſt, than I have been?

out

Druſus commands the conſul Marcius Philippus to be carried to priſon.

The probity of Druſus.

Druſus aſſaſſinated.

And a few hours after expired. It was never discovered who had hired the assassin; but the suspicion of this black attempt fell on the consul Philippus, on Cæpio, and on Varus, one of his fellow-tribunes, who soon after proposed a law, declaring traytors and enemies to the state all those, who should move for granting to the allies the prerogative of citizenship. Drusus was a man of an unspotted character, and for love to his country was no-ways inferior to the greatest heroes of Rome. He dedicated all his thoughts, cares, and life itself to the service of his republic. But, as the evil was now become incurable, all his attempts, for preserving the state from impending ruin, were unsuccessful. Not many years after the ungrateful republic lost her liberty; and the sovereign power, which Drusus's measures might have prevented, soon devolved to his family; for he was the grandfather of Livia, the wife of Augustus, and consequently the great grandfather of the emperor Tiberius [t].

His character.

The allies arm.

The death of Drusus, thus basely assassinated for attempting to procure the right of citizenship to the Italian allies, provoked them to such a degree, that they began to arm with a design to do themselves justice. Pompædius Silo, the most famous general among the Marsi, put himself at the head of ten thousand men, and marched towards Rome, which he designed to surprise and plunder. But Cn. Domitius, his old friend, meeting him on the road as he was going to his country-house, prevailed upon him to lay aside his design, and return to his own country [u]. As the republic was threatened with a war, two men of distinguished merit were promoted to the consulate, viz. L. Julius Cæsar and P. Rutilius Lupus. In the very beginning of their administration, the Marsi, Peligni, Samnites, Campanians, and Lucanians, and in short all the provinces from the Liris to the Adriatic, revolted at once. Rome had never engaged more formidable enemies. As they had all served in the armies of the republic, they were as well disciplined as her legions, and their leaders had learnt the art of war under her most famous commanders. It is said of the Marsi in particular, that Rome had never gained a victory, in which they had not a great share. The first step they took in their revolt was, to erect erect themſelves into a republic in oppoſition to that of Rome. Corfinium, a great and ſtrong city in the country of the Peligni, was made the capital of their new republic. Thither were carried all the hoſtages given by the cities in the revolt, and prodigious ſtores of arms and proviſions. The city of Aſculum Picenum among the reſt reſolved to ſend her hoſtages to Corfinium, which Q. Servilius, who governed that province in quality of proconſul, no ſooner heard, than he flew to Aſculum, and entering it, threatened the inhabitants with the vengeance of Rome. But they, deſpiſing his menaces, ran to arms, and cut in pieces the proconſul, Fonteius his lieutenant, and all the Romans they found in their territory. War being thus openly declared, Rome made what haſte ſhe could to levy troops, and appoint the conſuls their provinces. Cæſar was ordered into Samnium, and Rutilius into the country of the Marſi. The latter choſe for his lieutenant-generals Cn. Pompeius, the father of Pompey the Great, C. Marius, Q. Cæpio, C. Perperna, and Valerius Meſſala. Cæſar nominated for his chief officers P. Lentulus, Cornelius Sylla, T. Didius, P. Licinius Craſſus, and M. Marcellus. Thus were all the commanders of note in Rome employed in this new war. Neither were theſe lieutenants to ſerve barely as ſubalterns; every one had a body of troops under his command with the title of proconſul: nor were they confined to particular provinces or diſtricts; every one was ordered to go where-ever he was wanted, and all directed to aſſiſt each other. While Rome was taking theſe wiſe meaſures, the allies choſe alſo their conſuls and prætors, and formed a ſenate conſiſting of five hundred perſons to govern their new ſtate; ſo that Italy was now, for the firſt time, divided into two great and powerful republics. In the mean time, Cn. Pompeius, marching with a detachment from Rome to revenge the death of Servilius on the Aſculani, attempted to take their city by aſſault. But the inhabitants made an unexpected ſally, put the Romans to flight, and purſued them with great ſlaughter. After this the two conſuls took the field; Julius Cæſar entered Samnium, and Rutilius the country of the Marſi. The Latins, who ſtill continued faithful to the republic, furniſhed their contingent of troops as uſual. The Hetrurians likewiſe, the Umbrians, and the eaſtern kings ſent large ſupplies to ſupport Rome in ſo dangerous a war. The faithful Minatius Magius, whom Velleius Paterculus reckons among his anceſtors, though a native of Aſculum, raiſed as many men for

[t] Appian. de bell. civil. l. i. Vell. Patercul. l. ii. Liv. epit. l. lxxi. c. 20. Plin. l. xxxiii. c. 3. Val. Max. l. ix. c. 5. Flor. l. iii. c. 17. [u] Diodor. Sicul. apud. Vales. Cic. de orat. l. i

And erect themſelves into a republic.

Cn. Pompeius put to flight by the allies.

the Romans as amounted to the number of a legion. Sertorius, at this time quæſtor in Ciſalpine Gaul, brought a reinforcement of Gauls to the relief of his country, fought the allies with his uſual bravery, and having loſt one of his eyes in this war, he ever after gloried in that honourable deformity [w].

THE country of the Marſi, which had fallen to Rutilius, was defended by two able generals, Preſenteius and Vettius Cato. The former was oppoſed by C. Perperna, who commanded a great body of troops under the conſul. The Roman immediately offered the enemy battle, which Preſenteius did not decline. Both armies fought with unparallelled bravery; but the Romans were at laſt put to the rout, after having loſt about four thouſand men. A few days after this defeat, Vettius Cato, who oppoſed Rutilius, being informed that the conſul deſigned to paſs the river Telonius in the night, lay in ambuſh for the conſular army, attacked them unexpectedly, and drove them back into the river. In this action eight thouſand Romans were either cut in pieces, or drowned in the river. The conſul himſelf was killed witn a great many officers of diſtinction. The attack was ſo ſudden, that Marius, who was encamped on the banks of the river at a ſmall diſtance from the conſul, had no notice of it, till the Telonius brought a great number of dead bodies to his camp. The news of this overthrow, and the ſight of the conſul's body, which was brought to Rome, filled the city with terror. For fear of a ſurpriſe guards were placed at all the gates, the number of the centinels on the ramparts was encreaſed, and all the avenues to the city well guarded. Theſe were neceſſary precautions during a war, wherein the ſoldiers of the two oppoſite parties were dreſſed and armed after the ſame manner, ſpoke the ſame language, and were well acquainted with the cuſtoms of each other. The legions, which Rutilius had commanded, were divided between Marius and Cæpio. The latter ſuffered himſelf to be ſhamefully overreached by Pompædius Silo, commander in chief of the allies. He came as a ſuppliant to the proconſul, accompanied by two young ſlaves richly dreſſed, whom he pretended to be his ſons, each of them carrying in his hand a lump of lead, the one covered with a thin plate of gold, and the other of ſilver, which he ſaid were the preſents his children came to lay at his feet. The proconſul received Pompædius with Perperna defeated by the allies.

The conſul Rutilius defeated and killed.

[w] Vell. Patercul. l. i. Plut. in Sertorio. Appian. bell. civil. l. i.

with great politeneſs, and admitted him into his confidence; when the crafty Italian, pretending to lead him to a place where he might ſurpriſe the enemy, conducted him into narrow defiles, where the proconſul was ſlain, and the beſt part of his army cut in pieces [x]. Thus fell Q. Cæpio, who, by his warm oppoſition to Druſus's ſcheme, had been the chief author of the preſent war.

Q. Cæpio defeated and killed.

THESE ſucceſſes raiſed the courage of the allies, who under their various leaders gained conſiderable advantages over the Romans. Judacilius, Afranius, and Ventidius, three officers of diſtinction among the confederates, having united their forces, obliged Cn. Pompeius to ſhelter himſelf behind the walls of Firnum in Picenum. Marius Ignatius ſurpriſed the city of Venafrum in Campania, and cut in pieces the Roman garriſon, conſiſting of two cohorts. The city of Nola ſurrendered to Aponius, one of the conſuls of the allies, and delivered up to him the Roman garriſon, to the number of two thouſand men, with the prætor L. Poſthumius, who commanded them. The ſame Aponius ſeized the cities of Stabiæ, Liternum, and Salernum, and overran all Campania. In Lucania, Lamponius drove M. Licinius out of the field, killed eight hundred of his men, and obliged him to take refuge in the city of Grumentum. Judacilius reduced almoſt all Apulia, and brought the cities of Canuſium and Venuſia over to the confederates [y].

The allies gain conſiderable advantages.

IN Samnium, the conſul Julius Cæſar was defeated by Vettius Cato the Samnite, and forced to take ſhelter in a neighbouring city, after having loſt two thouſand men. However, he ſoon left the place of his retreat to relieve Acerræ, which was cloſely beſieged by Aponius. That general, having releaſed Oxyntas the ſon of Jugurtha from his confinement in the city of Venuſia, brought him to his army, and there treated him as king. The Numidians, who ſerved in the conſul's army, no ſooner heard that the ſon of their old king was fighting for the allies, than they began to deſert by companies; inſomuch, that the conſul was obliged to part with all his Numidian cavalry, and ſend them back into Africa. This diminution of the conſular troops raiſed the courage of Aponius, who came to inſult the Romans at the very gates of their camp. But Cæſar ſallying out unexpectedly, fell ſo briſkly on the enemy, that they were forced to retire after having loſt ſix thouſand

The conſul Julius Cæſar defeated.

The allies repulſed by Cæſar.

[x] Appian. ibid. Oroſ. l. v. c. 18. [y] Appian. & Liv. ibid. Flor. l. iii. c. 18. Oroſ. l. 5. c. 18.

ſand men. As this was the firſt victory the Romans had gained over the allies, it occaſioned great joy both at Rome and in the army. The ſenate rewarded the brave conſul by confirming the title of Imperator (O) which the ſoldiers had given him on the field of battle. In the mean time, Marius, being attacked in his camp by Herrius Acinius, the chief of the Marrucini, put the enemy to flight, and forced them to take ſhelter in a place which they deemed inacceſſible. But Sylla, whom they did not expect, paſſing accidentally that way with his flying camp, attacked them, made a terrible ſlaughter of their troops, and completed the victory with the death of their general; which was no ſmall mortification to Marius. At the ſame time Servius Sulpicius, having defeated in a pitched battle the Peligni and reduced their whole country, marched to the relief of Cn. Pompeius, who was beſieged in Firmum by Afranius, attacked his camp, killed him in the action, and cut moſt of his troops in pieces. After this victory, Pompeius laid ſiege to Aſculum, whither the remains of the enemy's army had fled for refuge. In the country of the Marſi, Marius, after having continued ſeveral months in a ſtate of inaction, to inure his troops to diſcipline, at length took the field, and gave battle. But he was ſenſible in the action, that he was not now the ſame man. As he was in the ſixty-eighth year of his age, and ſubject to various diſtempers, his ſtrength and former vivacity had failed him. His troops, not being animated by his example, as they expected, ſuſtained the firſt ſhock but faintly, and then fled in diſorder to their camp. The bad ſucceſs of this battle was ſuch a mortification to Marius, that, under pretence of his infirmities, he reſigned the command, and returned to Rome [z].

The Marrucini defeated by Marius and Sylla.

Sulpicius overcomes and kills Afranius.

Marius defeated.

THE fame of this victory gained by the Marſi induced the Umbrians and Hetrurians to declare for the confederates. It was therefore neceſſary for Rome to encreaſe the number of her forces, in proportion as the number of her enemies [z] Plut. in Mario & Sylla. Appian. ibid.

(O) In the times of the republic the title of Imperator was an occaſional mark of honour, which the armies ſometimes beſtowed on their generals in their acclamations, and which the ſenate confirmed in favour of thoſe who had ſignalized themſelves by important victories. But under the Cæſars it became a title of ſovereignty.

mies encreaſed; but as the capital alone was not able to furniſh as many as were requiſite to complete the many legions that were to be raiſed, the ſenate, by a ſtep which was never taken but in the utmoſt danger, ordered the freedmen to be enliſted, and formed twelve cohorts of them, which were employed as garriſons in the maritime cities; ſo that Rome could ſend all her legions, under the command of Lucius Porcius and Aulus Plautius, againſt the united forces of the Umbrians and Hetrurians, whom they defeated in a pitched battle, but not without the loſs of many brave legionaries [a].

Freed-men enliſted at Rome.

As the conſular year was near expiring, the conſul Julius Cæſar, deſirous to put an end to the war before he went out of his office, drew up a law, which was confirmed by the ſenate, and enacted, That all the nations in Italy, whoſe alliance with Rome was indiſputable, ſhould enjoy the rights of Roman citizens. This law, which was ever after called the Julian law, much abated the ardor of the enemy, and drew off ſeveral nations from the confederacy; however, the war was ſtill carried on by the Lucanians, Samnites, Marſi, Picentes, &c. The new conſuls therefore, Cn. Pompeius Strabo and L. Porcius Cato, no ſooner entered upon their office, than they took the field. The former, who was the father of Pompey the Great, and called Strabo becauſe he ſquinted, went to carry on the ſiege Aſculum, and deſtroyed a whole army of Marſi, who came to relieve it. Five thouſand of them were killed upon the ſpot, with their general Fulcancus, a man of great bravery and experience in war, and the reſt periſhed with hunger and cold among the Apennines, where they had taken ſhelter. However, Aſculum ſtill held out againſt the conſular army, depending on relief from the brave Judacilius, a native of that place. That intrepid commander ordered his countrymen to make a ſally at a time appointed, promiſing to force his way into the city through the Roman army. Accordingly he made the attempt at the head of eight cohorts, and, though not ſeconded by the Aſculans, bravely performed his promiſe, and entered the place; a glorious action, not inferior to the illuſtrious exploits of the braveſt Romans! Having thus forced his way ſword in hand into the city, he firſt put to death thoſe who had prevented the ſally, and then, finding he could not force the Romans to raiſe the ſiege, he put an end to his life by poiſon, that he might not ſurvive the ruin of his country [b].

The Julian law.

An army of Marſi deſtroyed.

The gallant behaviour of Judacilius.

In

[a] Appian. ibid. [b] Idem ibid.

The prætor Aſellio aſſaſſinated.

In the mean time, Aulus Sempronius Aſellio, the prætor urbanus, having exaſperated the rich by many judgments he gave againſt uſury, was murdered by them, as he was offering a ſacrifice to Caſtor and Pollux in the forum. The ſenate ordered enquiries to be made after the authors of ſo black an attempt; but the money of the uſurers ſtopped the mouths both of the accuſers and witneſſes; ſo that this notorious and ſcandalous iniquity eſcaped unpuniſhed. However, the tribune M. Plautius Sylvanus, to put a ſtop to the licentiouſneſs of the people, made a law, whereby it was declared a capital crime for any citizen to come into the comitium with arms of any kind, or to diſturb the judges in their courts. The ſame tribune, by another law, deprived the Roman knights of their juriſdiction, which they abuſed in a moſt flagrant manner. The Plautian law enacted, that each tribe ſhould chuſe fifteen men out of their own body, to whom the cognizance of civil cauſes ſhould be committed. By this means men only of known probity, of what rank ſoever they were, had the charge of adminiſtring juſtice, which was done with great impartiality. This zealous tribune, in conjunction with Caius Papirius Carbo, one of his collégues, put the laſt hand to the Julian law, which we have mentioned above, in favour of the allies, and got it confirmed by the people, and publiſhed in the following words: All the citizens of the allied cities, who ſhall be in Italy at the time of the promulgation of this law, ſhall be deemed citizens of Rome, provided they regiſter their names with one of the three prætors within ſixty days. This brought the Italians to Rome in ſuch numbers, that the new citizens ſoon became more numerous than the old; but, leſt this ſhould make ſtrangers maſters of the elections, and conſequently of the republic, the new cenſors, Lucius Cæſar and P. Licinius Craſſus, did not incorporate them in the thirty-five Roman tribes, but formed them into new tribes, who were to vote laſt. By this means all matters were determined by a majority of voices, before the new tribes gave their ſuffrages. The allies were ſenſible of this artifice, but diſſembled their diſſatisfaction, being reſolved, when an opportunity offered, to put themſelves upon a level with the old inhabitants of Rome [c].

The Roman knights deprived of their juriſdiction.

The new citizens formed into tribes.

During

[c] Appian. ibid. Aul. Gell. l. xiii. c. 4. Liv. epit. l. lxxiv. c. 53. Cic. pro Archia. Pædian. in Cic. pro Cornelio.

During these regulations at Rome, the war was pursued with vigour in the provinces which continued in the revolt. The consul Pompeius, having turned the siege of Asculum into a blockade, led his best troops against Vettius Cato, who covered the country of the Vestini with a great army, defeated him in a pitched battle, and reduced several cities. He afterwards granted Vettius a friendly conference, at which Cicero, who was making his first campaign under the consul, was present. How this conference ended, we are not told; but all historians agree, that the consul Pompeius put an end to the war with the Vestini [d]. In the country of the Marsi, the consul Porcius Cato, after having gained considerable advantages over that warlike people, resolved to force their camp on the banks of the lake Fucinus; but he was killed in the attempt by a dart discharged at him, as was suspected, not by the enemy, but by young Marius, who had quarrelled with him some days before, for speaking contemptuously of his father. The Marsi took advantage of this accident, put the Romans to the rout, and pursued them with great slaughter. On the other hand, the proconsul Cosconius defeated and killed the famous Marius Egnatius in a pitched battle. Upon his death, Trebatius the Samnite took upon him the command of the army; but he was likewise overcome in a second battle, and forced to take refuge in Canusium, after having lost in the action and the pursuit above fifteen thousand men. Then Cosconius over-ran the countries of the Larinates, Venusians, and Pediculi, and reduced them to obedience. The confederates began now to be in pain for Corfinium, the capital of their new republic, and therefore removed their senate and magazines to Esernia in the country of the Samnites. They also sent an embassy to Mithridates in Asia, who had now declared against Rome, hoping to obtain from him such supplies, as would enable them to recover their affairs; but Sylla, the hero of this campaign, frustrated their expectations. He besieged the city of Stabiæ in Campania, took it by assault, and gave it up to be plundered by his soldiers. He then marched against the Roman army, who had just murdered their general Postumius; but, instead of punishing them, he, to their great surprise, treated them with uncommon civility, and added them to his own legions. When his army was thus reinforced, he undertook the siege of Pompeii, a strong city in the

The Vestini under Vettius Cato defeated.

The consul Porcius Cato killed.

Great advantages gained over the allies by Sylla.

[d] Festus in Verranis. Cic. Phil. II. Liv. epit. l. lxxxv. c. 19.

the neighbourhood of Stabiæ. Cluentius, one of the generals of the allies, haſtened to the relief of the beſieged; but was repulſed with great loſs. Cluentius, having not long after received a reinforcement of Gauls, appeared again in the field, and inſulted Sylla within reach of his intrenchments; but a Gauliſh champion, who challenged the braveſt Roman to a ſingle combat at the head of the two armies, being killed by a young Mauritanian, the reſt, ſtruck with a panic, fled, and the troops of Cluentius with them. Sylla purſued them, cut thirty thouſand of the fugitives in pieces, and then returning to the ſiege of Pompeii, reduced that important place. From Pompeii he marched to Nola, whither Cluentius had fled with the remains of his ſhattered army. He attacked him a-new under the walls of that city, killed him in the battle, and with him twenty thouſand Samnites, who had flocked from all parts to join him after his firſt defeat. The victorious general, having taken and plundered the enemy's camp, brought his legions into Hirpinia, which he reduced, after having made himſelf maſter of Aſculana, the metropolis of the country. He then fell upon Samnium, where he was ſurrounded in narrow paſſes by the famous Aponius, and reduced to the utmoſt diſtreſs. However, he found means to recover this falſe ſtep, and eſcape, when all his men looked upon themſelves as loſt. He agreed to a truce with Aponius, then ſtole out of his camp in the dark, and taking a compaſs, fell on the enemy's rear, while they were buſy in plundering the deſerted camp, ſo vigorouſly and ſo unexpectedly, that the Samnites, ſeized with terror, fled without making any reſiſtance. Having now no enemy to contend with in the field, he marched to Bovianum, and took it by ſtorm [e].

The city of Aſculum reduced.

In the mean time, the conſul Pompeius, after a long ſiege, reduced the city of Aſculum, and puniſhed the inhabitants, who had murdered a Roman prætor, with the utmoſt ſeverity. He ſaved a ſmall number of their chiefs to grace his triumph, and cauſed all the other perſons of diſtinction in the place to be put to death. To the reſt of the inhabitants he granted life and liberty; but confiſcated their lands, and gave their houſes up to be plundered by his ſoldiers.

Sylla choſen conſul.

When winter approached, the generals returned to Rome, where Sylla, who had eclipſed all the other commanders during this campaign, was rewarded with the conſulate. He had alſo intereſt enough to get Q. Rufus Pompeius, peius, whoſe ſon had lately married his daughter Cornelia, choſen for his collegue. The conſul Pompeius, on his return to Rome was honoured with a triumph, which many illuſtrious captives graced, and among the reſt P. Ventidius and his wife, who carried in her arms her young ſon, whom we ſhall ſee in the courſe of this hiſtory conſul in Rome, and riding himſelf in triumph to the capitol, after having conquered the moſt warlike and formidable enemy Rome ever engaged.

[e] Plut. in Sylla. Appian. ibid.

As ſoon as Sylla entered on his new office, he began to uſe all his intereſt, both with the patricians and plebeians, to get the command of the army, which was to be employed againſt Mithridates, conferred upon himſelf; but in this he was oppoſed by Marius, who, tho' worn out with many diſtempers, and inſufficient for that ſervice on account of his age, was ſtill deſirous of appearing at the head of an army. In order to ſupplant his rival Sylla, he contracted a ſtrict friendſhip with P. Sulpicius, tribune of the people, whoſe character Plutarch gives us in the following words: Sulpicius, ſays he, excelled all men in wickedneſs; he was a compound of cruelty, impudence, and all ſorts of crimes, which, how enormous ſoever, he committed with the greateſt confidence and unconcern. He kept three thouſand deſperate men in conſtant pay, and had conſtantly about him a company of young knights, whom he ſtyled his antiſenatorial band. The ſeditious tribune, to ſtrengthen his own and Marius's party, paſſed ſeveral laws in favour of the people, whom by that means he gained over to his intereſt. He then applied himſelf wholly to the ſecuring of the Italian allies; and, in order to this, he propoſed a law, enacting that all the inhabitants of Italy, who had lately obtained the right of citizenſhip, ſhould be blended with the other citizens, incorporated into the thirty-five tribes, and conſequently ſhould have the very ſame right of voting, each in his tribe, as others had, without any diſtinction. This was effectually making himſelf maſter of a majority of voices on all occaſions; for he did not doubt, but all the new citizens would be under his influence, and would vote as he ſhould direct [e].

Marius jealous of Sylla's glory.

The tribune Sulpicius.

Propoſes a law in favour of the allies.

BEFORE the comitia met for the accepting or rejecting of this law, Rome had the ſatisfaction to hear, that her generals againſt the allies were attended with uncommon ſucceſs.

[e] Plut. Appian. ibid.

ſucceſs. Ser. Sulpicius brought the whole country of the Marrucini under ſubjection. The Veſtini and Peligni ſubmitted of their own accord to the old conſul Cn. Pompeius, who was returned, after his triumph, to his camp at Aſculum; nay, they even promiſed to deliver up their leader Vettius: but as they were dragging him along in chains, a faithful ſlave, thinking it his duty to deliver his maſter from the inſults of his haughty enemies, firſt ſtabbed him, and then himſelf. L. Licinius Muræna and Q. Cæcilius Pius obliged the Marſi, among whom the war had begun, to ſue for peace; but the brave Pompædius ſtill ſupported the ſinking cauſe at the head of twenty thouſand ſlaves, whom he had juſt armed. Againſt him marched Cæcilius Pius and Ser. Sulpicius, and gave him battle, in which his army was routed and he himſelf killed. The only place that now held out for the allies was Nola; and Sylla ſet out from Rome to reduce it: but he was ſoon recalled, to reſtrain the inſolence of the tribune Sulpicius, who carried all before him at Rome, not by perſuaſion, but by violence and force. He had already appointed a day for the comitia to meet, in order to accept the law for incorporating the allies into the thirty-five tribes. Sylla, upon his arrival, joined his collegue Pompeius Rufus, and both agreed to order ſeveral feriæ or holidays to be kept, during which it was not lawful for the people to meet or tranſact any buſineſs. This they did to gain time; but Sulpicius no ſooner heard, that the conſuls had proclaimed feriæ, than he left his houſe, and attended by his guards, whom he ordered to conceal daggers under their robes, marched ſtrait to the temple of Caſtor, where the conſuls had aſſembled the ſenate. The conſcript fathers were ſurpriſed when they ſaw Sulpicius appear, and more ſo, when they heard him inſolently command them to diſannul the conſular decree, which ordered feriæ to be kept. The conſuls oppoſed the repealing of the decree, and ſeveral of the ſenators did the ſame. Hereupon the furious tribune let looſe his antiſenatorial band upon them, who, drawing their daggers, fell upon the defenceleſs ſenators. The conſul Pompeius eſcaped in the crowd; but his ſon, a young ſenator, who had lately married Sylla's daughter, was killed by the aſſaſſins. Sylla, being cloſely purſued by Sulpicius's ruffians, took refuge in Marius's houſe; which they not ſuſpecting, hurried by, ſo that Sylla eſcaped falling

The Marrucini, Veſtini, &c. reduced.

Diſturbances raiſed in Rome by the tribune Sulpicius.

The ſon of the conſul Pompeius killed.

falling into their hands. Marius, tho' naturally cruel and revengeful, did not care to ſtain his hands with the blood of a conſul, who had taken refuge in his houſe. He only forced him to ſwear that he would aboliſh the feriæ, which he had appointed. After exacting this oath, Marius himſelf let Sylla eſcape by a back-door: and Sylla kept his word; for he went directly to the comitium, and in the preſence of the people, repealed the feriæ. By this compliance he ſo far pleaſed Sulpicius, that the tribune did not deprive him of his office; whereas he prevailed upon the people, whoſe ſuffrages he had at his command, to depoſe Pompeius [f].

Sylla retires from Rome.

And now Sylla, not thinking himſelf any longer ſafe in Rome, where the oppoſite party prevailed, left the city, and repaired in all haſte to his camp near Nola. The feriæ being repealed and both conſuls fled, Sulpicius, now abſolute maſter at Rome, got the law paſſed, incorporating the allies into the thirty-five tribes, and at the ſame time extorted from the people another in favour of Marius. The ſenate had already inveſted Sylla with the command of the army, which was to be employed againſt Mithridates; but Sulpicius got a law paſſed, enacting, That the conſul ſhould continue in Italy, and that Marius, tho' now only a private man, ſhould command the Roman legions in Aſia. Marius no ſooner received his commiſſion, than he diſpatched two military tribunes, one of whom was Gratedius, a relation of his own, to acquaint the troops under the command of Sylla, that their general was changed, and that they were no longer to obey Sylla, but Marius, whom the Roman people had appointed to carry on the war againſt the king of Pontus; but the ſoldiers, who were greatly attached to Sylla, inſtead of obeying the orders that were brought from Marius, buried the two meſſengers under a heap of ſtones, and cried out with one voice, Let us march to Rome; let us revenge there the injuries done to the conſular dignity; and the oppreſſion of our fellow citizens. On the other hand, Marius, by way of repriſal for the death of the two tribunes, put Sylla's friends in the city to the ſword, and plundered their houſes; which Sylla no ſooner heard, than he determined to march ſtrait to Rome. His army conſiſted of ſix legions, who, being all warmed with his ſpirit, breathed nothing but vengeance and plunder; but ſeveral officers, unwilling to turn turn their arms againſt their own country, quitted the ſervice. On the other hand, many who diſliked the violence of Marius and Sulpicius, left Rome, and took refuge in Sylla's camp; ſo that the road from Nola to Rome was crouded with people hurrying to and fro, ſome from the camp to the city, others from the city to the camp. Many retired into the country, to avoid taking either ſide in this civil war. Q. Pompeius, the other conſul, whom Sulpicius had depoſed, haſtened to join his collegue with all the troops he could get together.

The people appoint Marius to command in Aſia.

Sylla marches to Rome.

[f] Plut. & Appian. ibid.

MARIUS and Sulpicius being informed, that the two conſuls were advancing at the head of a numerous army, towards the city and having themſelves no troops to oppoſe them, prevailed upon the conſcript fathers to ſend two prætors, Brutus and Servilius, to meet Sylla upon the road, and ſtop him in his march. The prætors delivered their meſſage to Sylla in terms a little too haughty; which ſo incenſed the ſoldiery, that they broke their faſces, tore off their purple robes, and would have cut them in pieces with their attendants, had not Sylla reſtrained their fury. When the Romans ſaw the two magiſtrates return without the enſigns and marks of their dignity, and in great diſorder, they concluded, that all reſpect for the laws was laid aſide, and that violence and ſuperior power was thenceforth to determine all things. Marius and Sulpicius, who had only a handful of factious men to oppoſe a powerful and inraged enemy, diſpatched, in the name of the ſenate, meſſenger after meſſenger, to amuſe the conſul with rambling propoſals and retard his march. The conſul, who was well appriſed of their deſign, to elude one artifice with another, pretended to acquieſce in their propoſals, and, in the preſence of the meſſengers, ordered the ground to be marked out for a camp; but, as ſoon as the deputies were gone, he detached a ſtrong party, under the command of L. Baſilius and C. Mummius, with orders to ſecure one of the gates, and marched himſelf at the head of his legions after them with ſuch expedition, that he was in ſight of Rome in a few hours. The party he had ſent before ſeized the Eſquiline gate, and Sylla reinforced that detachment with a whole legion. The conſul Pompeius, at the head of another legion, made himſelf maſter of the gate Collina. A third legion was poſted at the head of the bridge Sublicius, to ſhut up the entrance into the city on the ſide of the river. A fourth legion was ordered to patrol round the walls, walls, near the gate Cælimontana, and guard the approaches to it. The two other legions were ordered to march into the city ſword in hand. When they came into the ſtreet that faced the Eſquiline gate, Marius and Sulpicius appeared at the head of a company tumultuouſly aſſembled. Hereupon the trumpets of the conſular army ſounded the charge, which rouſed the martial ardor of the citizens, who were all formed to war; but, as they had no arms, they got up to the tops of their houſes, and fearing the town ſhould be plundered by Sylla's armed legions, diſcharged from thence ſuch ſhowers of tiles and ſtones upon them, as made the legionaries firſt halt, and then retire to the very gate. Upon this Sylla flew to the head of his legions, ordered them to advance, and taking a torch in his hand, threatened to ſet fire to the houſes, if the citizens did not immediately deſiſt from all hoſtilities. This terrified the people, who remained now only ſpectators of the battle between the two parties. In vain did Marius and Sulpicius call them to their aſſiſtance; no-body offered to take up arms, not even the ſlaves, tho' they proclaimed liberty by ſound of trumpet to all thoſe who ſhould join them. Marius, not being able, with a handful of ſeditious men, to withſtand the conſul's regular troops, was driven back, from ſtreet to ſtreet, to the temple of the goddeſs Tellus, where he made a ſtand, and charged the legions with great vigor; which obliged Sylla to ſend for ſome legionaries he had left at one of the gates. At the ſight of this reinforcement, Marius, fearing he ſhould be ſurrounded, retired, firſt to the capitol, and from thence to one of the gates of the city, which he was glad to leave, for fear of falling into the hands of his enemies. And now Sylla, ſeeing himſelf maſter of the city, poſted guards in all the open places, to prevent diſorders. He and his collegue were in motion all night, to reſtrain the ſoldiers, and to prevent their pillaging the houſes of their fellow citizens. He even cauſed ſome of his legions to be ſeverely puniſhed for entering a private houſe, and plundering it. As ſoon as it was day, the two conſuls aſſembled the people in the comitium, and harangued them with as much tranquillity, as if there had been no blood ſhed in Rome. Sylla, who was an excellent orator, after having deplored the calamities of the commonwealth, in terms no leſs moving than lively, propoſed the following laws, which, he ſaid, would reform the many abuſes that had crept into the government; 1ſt, That no law ſhould be brought before the people, till it had been

Sylla enters Rome by force.

Marius eſcapes out of Rome.

Several laws made by Sylla.

ſeen and approved of by the ſenate. 2dly, That the comitia ſhould not for the future be held by tribes, but by centuries. 3dly, That no citizen, who had been tribune of the people, ſhould be capable of any other magiſtracy. 4thly, That all the laws of the tribune Sulpicius ſhould be declared void and null. Theſe propoſals coming from a man, who was at the head of ſix legions and maſter of Rome, were readily accepted by the people [g].

Marius and Sulpicius proſcribed.

In the next place, articles of impeachment were drawn up againſt Caius Marius, his ſon, the tribune Sulpicius, ſeveral other tribunes of the people, two ſenators, and a great many of their adherents. They were all proſcribed, declared enemies to Rome, and a reward ſet upon their heads. The decree of the ſenate proſcribing them was proclaimed by ſound of trumpet in Rome, and in all the provinces ſubject to the republic. Every ſubject, friend, or ally of the republic was ordered to ſeize and put them to death, wherever they ſhould be found. At the ſame time Sylla detached troops to all parts. Sulpicius, being betrayed by one of his ſlaves, was immediately ſeized, and his head ſtruck off by one of Sylla's horſemen. His head was brought to Rome, and fixed upon a ſtake over-againſt the roſtra, where he had made ſo many ſeditious ſpeeches. The treacherous ſlave received at once the reward and puniſhment due to his treachery. Sylla ſet him at liberty, ordered the money to be paid him for the diſcovery of Sulpicius; but at the ſame time commanded him to be thrown down headlong from the Tarpeian rock for betraying his maſter.

Sulpicius ſeized, and killed.

The ſenate and people diſpleaſed with Sylla's conduct.

The people could not behold the head of one of their magiſtrates expoſed to public view, without a ſecret indignation. The ſenate likewiſe murmured at the proſcription of Marius, from a natural compaſſion, always ſhewn to heroes, when fallen into diſtreſs. Tho' the fathers were well pleaſed to ſee the people humbled, yet, jealous of the honour and dignity of their body, they could not bear, that their collegues ſhould be proſcribed like villains and thieves. The people in general reproached Sylla with ingratitude, for condemning to death a man, who, not long before, had ſaved his life, when he was at his mercy. If Marius had given way to Sulpicius, who was for diſpatching Sylla, he had, by his death, been maſter of all; but he choſe rather to ſpare his life, for which Sylla, when i came to his turn to be uppermoſt, made him a very ungrateful and ungenerous acknowledgment. Theſe reflections alienated the minds of all from Sylla, as he experienced at the next elections; for Nonnius, his ſiſter's ſon, and Servius Sulpicius, who had long ſerved under him, were excluded from the conſulate, tho' earneſtly recommended by him; but he, inſtead of reſenting ſuch treatment, affected to be well pleaſed with it, ſaying, That he ſaw with joy the people by his means reſtored to their full liberty of chuſing whom they pleaſed; nay, to reconcile the minds of the people to him, he ſuffered them to raiſe to the conſulate L. Cornelius Cinna, who was of the contrary faction, after having prevailed upon him in private to renounce, in a moſt ſolemn manner, his former principles and engagements with Marius, and to ſwear an inviolable attachment to the party of the ſenate. This oath Cinna took in the temple of Jupiter Capitolinus, adding to it the following imprecation; If I do not punctually obſerve the oath in its full extent, may I be thrown out of the city, in the ſame manner, as I throw this ſtone out of my hand; at which words he threw on the ground a ſtone which he held in his hand. Cinna was a man of no principles, of moſt depraved manners, furious and inconſiderate in all his undertakings, wholly addicted to the popular faction, a declared enemy to the nobility, and capable of ſupporting the intereſt of his faction, with a courage and conſtancy worthy of a better citizen. The collegue given him by the tribes was Cn. Octavius, a man of an unblemiſhed character, and whoſe love for his country was the governing principle of his life. And now Sylla was wholly intent on making the beſt uſe of the little time he and his collegue Pompeius were to enjoy the conſulate. Their chief aim was, to rid the republic of the two Marii, father and ſon, for whom, tho' proſcribed, intereſt was ſecretly made in Rome. A great price was ſet upon their heads, and ſquadrons of horſe, ſent out in queſt of them, had been long ſcouring the neighbouring country, with orders to bring them to Rome dead or alive [h].

cam

[g] Appian. in Plut. ibid.

Cinna choſen conſul.

His character.

THE ſufferings and dangers of Marius in his flight and exile were very extraordinary, and would be as affecting, if we could forget his crimes, and remember only his victories. As ſoon as he was got out of Rome, all thoſe who attended him in his flight, ſeparated and diſperſed; and night coming on, he retired, with young Marius and Granius, his wife's ſon by a former huſband, to a ſmall houſe he had near Rome. From thence he ſent his ſon for proviſions to a neighbouring farm of his father-in-law Mucius (P); but, in the mean time, being informed, that a party of horſe was ſearching for him in that neighbourhood, he left his houſe, without waiting for his ſon's return, and, attended by Granius alone, haſtened to Oſtia, where a friend of his, called Numerius, had provided a ſhip for him againſt all events. He immediately went on board, and weighing anchor, coaſted along the Italian ſhore. He was in no ſmall apprehenſion of one Geminius, a leading man in Terracina and his ſworn enemy. He therefore directed the ſeamen to keep clear of that place, and avoid a ſhore, which might prove fatal to him: which they were willing to do; but the wind ſhifting on a ſudden and blowing hard, the mariners, fearing the ſhip would not be able to weather the ſtorm, and ſeeing Marius indiſpoſed and ſea-ſick, tacked about, and with great difficulty made Circæum. There they landed Marius, who, oppreſſed with hunger, exhauſted with the fatigues of the ſea, and ſurrounded with dangers on all ſides, rambled about the fields, in the utmoſt diſtreſs, it being dangerous for him to meet people, and no leſs ſo to meet none, by reaſon of the extreme want to which he was reduced.

The flight and adventures of Marius.

[h] Plut. ibid.

On the other hand, Marius the ſon ran no leſs dangers at the houſe of Mucius, where he made all the haſte he could to provide himſelf with ſuch things as he wanted, and

(P) This Mucius was the famous Quintus Mucius Scævola, one of the moſt virtuous and learned citizens of Rome. When Sylla appeared in Rome after the defeat of Marius, and all things gave way to the will of the conqueror, Scævola alone had courage enough to oppoſe, in Sylla's preſence, the ſentence of condemnation, which the ſenators were going to paſs againſt Marius. When the conqueror threatened him with the ſevereſt vengeance, if he refuſed to ſubſcribe the decree of proſcription. "You attempt "in vain, ſaid he, to intimidate me with your threatenings. You "may let out, if you pleaſe, the little blood that is left in my "veins in my old age. Neither the ſight of the armed ſoldiers "who ſurround me, nor the fear of any puniſhment you can in"flict upon me, ſhall ever force me to declare that hero an ene"my to his country, to whom Rome is indebted for her ſafety "and her moſt glorious conqueſts (10).

(10) Val. Max. l. iii.

and to pack them up; but, day-light overtaking him, he had like to have been diſcovered by a party of Sylla's horſe, who appeared at ſome diſtance riding full ſpeed towards the farm; but the faithful ſlave, who took care of it, found out an expedient to ſave the life of the young Roman. He hid him in a cart loaded with beans, and then putting to his horſes, drove towards the horſemen, as if he were going with his cart to Rome. The ſoldiers paſſed by him, and breaking into the houſe, ſearched every corner of it; but in the mean time the ſlave conveyed young Marius to his wife, who immediately ſupplied him with money and proviſions. As ſoon as it grew dark, he took leave of his wife, and made to ſea-ſide, where he went on board a ſhip, which was bound for Africa, and ready to ſet ſail. He had a good paſſage, and arrived ſafe in a country, where the great Marius was known and revered [i].

In the mean time, the father, wandering about the fields in the neighbourhood of Circæum, towards the evening met with ſome cowherds, of whom he begged a morſel of bread; but they had not wherewithal to relieve him. Some of them knowing Marius, adviſed him to be gone as ſoon as poſſible; for they had ſeen a little beyond the place a party of horſe in ſearch of him. He therefore turned out of the high-road, and, tho' ready to faint for hunger and weakneſs, got with much-ado to a neighbouring wood, where he paſſed the night very uncomfortably. The next day, pinched with hunger, and willing to make uſe of the little ſtrength he had left, before it was quite exhauſted, he travelled by the ſea-ſide, amuſing Granius, and the few domeſtics he had with him, with ſeveral ſtories, to leſſen their fatigues and encourage them not to deſert him. He told them, that, when he was a child, an eagle's airy, with ſeven young ones in it, fell into his lap; and that his parents, being much ſurpriſed at the accident, conſulted the augurs about it, who anſwered, that the child would be ſeven times poſſeſſed of the ſupreme power and authority in his country. This was, no doubt, invented by Marius, to keep up the courage of thoſe who were with him. Plutarch tells us, that an eagle never hatches more than two young ones at a time; but, be that as it will, it is certain, that Marius, in his exile and greateſt extremities, uſed often to ſay, that he ſtill entertained hopes of a ſeventh conſulſhip [k].

[i] Plut. ibid. [k] Idem ibid.

WHEN Marius and his company were within twenty furlongs of Minturnæ, they diſcovered a troop of horſe making up to them with all ſpeed, and at the ſame time two ſmall veſſels under ſail near the ſhore. Hereupon they immediately threw themſelves into the ſea, and ſwam towards the ſhips. Granius ſoon reached one of them; but Marius, whoſe body was heavy and unwieldy, was with great difficulty borne above the water by two ſlaves, and put into the other veſſel. He was ſcarce got on board, when the ſoldiers, who were in queſt of him, came to the ſtrand, and from thence commanded the mariners to ſend the proſcribed aſhore, or to throw them over board. Hereupon the ſailors long deliberated, whether they ſhould deliver up Marius to his enemies, or ſecure his eſcape; and at laſt compaſſion prevailed. The veſſels continued their courſe, and one of them landed Granius in the iſland of Ænaria; but the ſailors who had Marius on board, changing on a ſudden their reſolution, came to an anchor in the mouth of the Liris. There they adviſed him to land and take ſome reſt, till the wind became more favourable. Marius followed their advice; and, lying down in an adjacent field, ſlept very ſoundly. In the mean time, the maſter of the veſſel weighed anchor, and put to ſea with a fair gale, thinking it neither honourable to deliver Marius into the hands of his enemies, nor ſafe to favour his eſcape. When Marius awaked, he found himſelf, to his great ſurprize, entirely deſerted; no ſhip at anchor; no domeſtics about him; all had diſappeared. This melancholy ſolitude encreaſed his fears; he began to ſuſpect his own domeſtics, and every thing ſeemed to threaten him with death. After he had lain ſome time penſive, he recovered his ſpirits, and ſummoning all his courage, he ſtarted up, and, walking croſs the marſhes formed by the overflowing of the Liris, wandered about, often wading through the mire and water up to the waiſt. At length he got to the hut of an old man, who looked after the fens, whom he earneſtly beſought to aſſiſt and preſerve a man, who, if he eſcaped the preſent danger, would make him returns beyond his expectation. The poor man, ſtruck with the venerable aſpect of Marius, whom perhaps he likewiſe knew, told him, that if he wanted only reſt, his cottage was very quiet; but, if he wanted to be concealed, he would lead him to a more private place. Marius deſired him to do ſo; and the old man carried him into the fens, made him lie down in a caye by the river-ſide, and covered him with reeds. He wa was ſcarce laid down, when he heard a great noiſe round the cottage. Geminius had ſent ſeveral troops of horſe from Terracina, upon a ſuſpicion that Marius had fled to the marſhes of Minturnæ. Theſe threatened the poor old man with the diſpleaſure of the conſuls and ſenate, and the ſevereſt puniſhments, for harbouring and concealing an enemy to the republic. Marius, who heard all this, thinking himſelf no longer ſafe in the place where he lay concealed, to deceive both the old man and the ſoldiers, left the cave, and, pulling off his garments, plunged into the lake of Marcia up to the chin in water, and covered his head with reeds; but the ſoldiers who were in purſuit of him, obſerving the water troubled and muddy about the place where he had thrown himſelf into the lake, after a diligent ſearch, diſcovered him, and, tying a cord about his neck, dragged him out of his new hiding-place, and led him naked to Minturnæ, to be executed there, purſuant to the decree of the ſenate, which had been publiſhed in all the cities of Italy.

Marius is diſcovered, and ſeized.

The magiſtrates of Minturnæ, into whoſe hands he was delivered by the ſoldiers, conſidering that his faction was ſtill formidable, and that Sylla's conſulſhip was near expiring, thought it dangerous to prefer either party to the other, and therefore were not in haſte to put the ſentence of the ſenate in execution. They did not even ſhut him up in their priſon; but ſent him, under a ſtrong guard, to the houſe of one Fannia, a rich woman, who was ſuſpected not to be well affected to him on an old account. She had been formerly married to one Tinnius, from whom being afterwards divorced, ſhe demanded her portion, which was very conſiderable. Hereupon her huſband, who had no mind to return it, accuſed her of adultery; and the cauſe was brought before Marius in his ſixth conſulſhip. Upon a full enquiry, it appeared, that Fannia had been guilty of incontinence before matrimony, and that it was not unknown to Tinnius; notwithſtanding which he married her, and had cohabited with her a conſiderable time. Marius therefore, after having heard both parties, ordered Tinnius to return the fortune, and laid a ſmall fine upon Fannia. The Minturnenſes took it for granted, that Fannia would reſent the diſgrace with which Marius had branded her; but ſhe, thinking ſhe had more reaſon to thank Marius for the return of her fortune, than to be offended at him for the eaſy fine he had laid upon her, took great care of him, and did all that lay in her power to comfort and encourage him (Q).

care

In the mean time, the magiſtrates of Minturnæ, after having conſulted together, determined at laſt to obey the decree of the ſenate, and put Marius to death immediately; but none of their citizens caring to imbrue his hands in the blood of ſo glorious a conqueror, an executioner was choſen out of the troops of the garriſon; ſome ſay he was a Cimber, others that he was a Gaul. However that be, when he went into the room where Marius was lodged with his ſword drawn, the eyes of that great warrior, as the place where he lay was dark, ſeemed to dart out flames; and at the ſame time the ruffian heard, or imagined to hear, a loud voice, ſaying, Stop, wretch! darſt thou kill Caius Marius! This filled him with terror; he dropped his ſword, and ruſhing out into the ſtreet, he uttered theſe words only, I cannot kill Caius Marius! This raiſed the compaſſion of the Minturnenſes, who immediately reverſed their ſentence, and were even angry with themſelves for making ſuch an unjuſt and ungrateful return, to one who had preſerved Italy. They therefore cried out with one voice, Let him go where he pleaſes; let him find his fate ſomewhere elſe; we beg pardon of the gods for thruſting Marius diſtreſſed and naked out of our city. After this, they crouded into his room, removed him from thence, and conducted him towards the ſea-ſide, every one lending a helping hand to forward his flight, and ſtriving to outdo each other in relieving and comforting the diſtreſſed hero. In order to get to the ſea-ſide, they were obliged [illegible]er to paſs through

But is ſet at liberty.

(Q) When Marius was brought to Fannia's houſe, as ſoon as the door was open, an aſs came running out to drink at a ſpring hard-by; and looking very briſk and lively upon Marius, firſt ſtood before him, then brayed aloud, and pranced by him. This was enough to raiſe the ſpirits of the proſcribed general, who was ſuperſtitious even to childiſhneſs. What was purely accidental often paſſed with him for ſome myſterious event. He now fancied, that the ſea would be more favourable to him than the land, ſince the aſs neglected its dry paſture, and turned from it to the water; and therefore, when the Minturnenſes reſolved to favour his eſcape, he conjured them to conduct him to the ſea-ſide. A man muſt be made up of ſuperſtitious follies to put ſuch an interpretation, as Marius did, on that action; and nevertheleſs, what is pleaſant enough, the event ſeemed to juſtify his conjectures: for at the ſea-ſide he found a veſſel ready equipped, which conveyed him ſafe to Æuaria.

through a grove conſecrated to the nymph Marcia, or to go a vaſt way about, which would have taken up too much of their time. The Minturnenſes had a ſingular veneration for this grove, and never ſuffered any thing to be removed out of it, that was once within it. They therefore ſcrupled to paſs through it, and were in great perplexity, fearing they might be overtaken by one of Sylla's parties, who were ſcouring the country, before they reached the ſea-ſide the other way. While they were deliberating among themſelves which way they ſhould take, an old man among them cried out, There is no place ſo ſacred, but we may paſs through it for the preſervation of Marius. Hereupon Marius firſt entered the grove, and the whole company marched after him, and arrived ſafe at the ſea-ſide, where Marius went on board a ſmall veſſel, which had been provided for him by one Belæus. Marius, when he returned to Rome at the head of an army, cauſed this whole adventure to be repreſented in a large piece of painting, and hung it up in the temple of Marcia, whom ſome take to be the ſame with Circe[1].

HOWEVER, the illuſtrious exile was not yet come to an end of his labours. He ordered his pilot to ſteer for the iſland of Ænaria, where he arrived ſafe, and rejoined Granius, whom he took on board with his other friends, and then ſailed for Africa; but, their water failing them in their paſſage, they were forced to touch at Eryx in Sicily. There the Roman quæſtor, who was appointed to guard the coaſt, and put to death ſuch of the proſcribed as ſhould land there, had like to have ſeized Marius, and actually killed ſixteen of his retinue, who were gone aſhore to fetch water. Hereupon Marius, putting to ſea again with all expedition, made the iſland of Meninx near the Little Syrtis, where he was informed, that his ſon had made his eſcape with Cethegus; and that they were both gone to the Numidian court, to implore the aſſiſtance of king Hiempſal. Being ſomewhat comforted with this news, he ventured to paſs over to the continent of Africa, and landed at the old port of Carthage. He was ſcarce got aſhore, when Sextilius, who then governed the African province in quality of proprætor, was informed of his arrival. As Sextilius was a politic man, and neither cared to diſobey the orders of the ſenate, nor incur the hatred of the Marian faction, by putting this great man to death, he immediately ſent one of his his officers to him, adviſing him to ſeek a retreat elſewhere, and threatening to put the decree of the ſenate in execution, if he ſet foot in Africa. At this meſſage the great Marius was ready to ſink under the weight of his calamity. He continued ſome time ſilent, looking ſternly upon the meſſenger; and at length, when the officer aſked what anſwer he ſhould return to the prætor, Go, tell your maſter, ſaid he, that you have ſeen the exiled Marius ſitting on the ruins of Carthage. By this noble anſwer he placed in a proper light the misfortunes of that once celebrated city and his own, as affecting inſtances of the viciſſitude of human affairs. Whether the prætor was moved with this meſſage, is uncertain; but Marius ſeems to have continued ſome time in that neighbourhood [m].

[1] Plut. in Mario. Val. Max. l. viii. c. 2. Vell. Patercul. l. ii.

In the mean time, young Marius, who, as we have related above, had ſet ſail for Africa, landing on the coaſt of Numidia, was received in a very gracious manner by king Hiempſal, or, as others will have it, by his ſon Mandreſtal, who had ſucceeded to the crown; but that prince being irreſolute and undetermined what part to act, whenever his noble gueſt talked of departing, found out ſome pretence or other to detain him. Hereupon Marius and Cethegus, who attended him in his misfortunes, began to ſuſpect, that ſome treachery lay concealed under the extraordinary civilities ſhewn them by the Numidian king; and would have made their eſcape, had they not found themſelves carefully watched, and, in ſhort, kept in a kind of honourable captivity. However, they found means at laſt to elude the king's evil deſigns. Their ſafety was owing to a very ſeaſonable adventure. As young Marius was very handſome and well made, one of the king's concubines fell in love with him, and even diſcovered her paſſion to him. The young Roman declined at firſt entering into any correſpondence with her, from an awful regard to the ſacred laws of hoſpitality; but finding at laſt, that by her means alone he could avoid the ſnares that were laid for him, and that there appeared more generoſity than wantonneſs, in the tenders ſhe made him of her affection, he gratified the fair Numidian, who thereupon found means, as her love was not merely the effect of an irregular appetite, to convey him and his companions ſafe out of the king's dominions. The young Roman, being thus delivered, we may ſay, from his captivity, haſtened to the Roman province, where he found found his father juſt landed. After they had tenderly ſaluted and embraced each other, they began to conſult together about the preſent ſituation of their affairs. As they were walking by the ſea-ſide, the old hero obſerved two ſcorpions fighting with great fury; and as his head was always filled with ſigns and prognoſtics, he drew ſiniſter interpretations from that combat. Let us fly, ſaid he to his ſon, Let us fly; ſome great danger threatens us here. This ſaid, he and his company went immediately into a fiſher's boat, and made towards Cercina, an iſland not far from the continent. They had ſcarce put off from the ſhore, when they ſaw the coaſt covered with horſemen, whom the king had ſent to bring back young Marius. In the iſland of Cercina, which lay near the Little Syrtis, and is now known by the name of Cereara, they found Albinovanus, who was likewiſe proſcribed; and there they all ſpent the winter together [n].

[m] Plut. in Mario. Appian. l. i. de bell. civil.

DURING theſe occurrences, Sylla and his collegue Q. Pompeius Rufus acted in concert at Rome, and made it their whole buſineſs to quiet the minds of the people there. As no body offered to oppoſe their meaſures, and a ſeeming calm reigned among all orders of men, the conſul Pompeius, who had not yet appeared at the head of his legions, reſolved to take the field, and march againſt theſe few allies, who ſtill continued in arms. The Roman army was ſtill in the hands of Pompeius Strabo, who, after his triumph, had returned to his old camp, with the title of proconſul. When he heard that the conſul was coming to ſucceed him, and ſnatch out of his hands the glory of finiſhing the war, in which he had acquired ſo much honour, he artfully applied himſelf to his troops, and worked them up to a reſolution of not parting with a general, under whoſe conduct they had gained ſo many victories. However, the conſul was quietly received in the camp, and took poſſeſſion of the army, the proconſul himſelf inveſting him in his office, and with the ornaments of his new dignity, without betraying the leaſt reluctance; but the next day, when the legions were aſſembled again to aſſiſt, according to cuſtom, at the ſacrifice, which new generals uſed to offer, ſome legionaries all on a ſudden fell upon the conſul, and killed him at the foot of the altar. In this tumult Pompeius Strabo acted his part with great dexterity; he ſhed tears over the body of the dead conſul, broke out into bitter ter invectives againſt the aſſaſſins, who had imbrued their hands in the blood of the ſupreme magiſtrate of the republic, and threatened to ſacrifice to his manes all thoſe who had any hand in ſo flagitious an attempt, of which there had been yet no inſtance in the republic; but, notwithſtanding theſe declarations, he made no enquiry after the criminals, but, tho' continued in the command of the army, buried the whole in oblivion °.

The conſul Pompeius Rufus aſſaſſinated by his ſoldiers.

[n] Plut. ibid.

SYLLA, who had but a few days to continue in his office, being alarmed at the aſſaſſination of his collegue, reſolved to ſet out immediately for Aſia. However, he was forced to continue ſome days at Rome after his conſulſhip was expired, and had the mortification to ſee the firſt furious ſteps of Cinna, whom he believed entirely come off from his mad zeal for the popular faction; for he no ſooner entered upon the conſulſhip, than joining with M. Virginius, tribune of the people, he cited Sylla, to whom he had ſworn an inviolable attachment, to appear on a charge of male adminiſtration. Hereupon that general, not thinking himſelf any longer ſafe in Italy, embarqued his troops, and ſet ſail for the eaſt, leaving Rome at the mercy of Cinna and his faction. Their firſt attempt was, to get a law paſſed in favour of the allies, whom Cinna was for incorporating into the thirty-five tribes, and putting upon a level with the ancient citizens. The conſul Octavius, who was attached to the ſenate, foreſeeing, that, by this important piece of ſervice, Cinna would ſecure the votes of the new citizens, and carry all before him in the aſſemblies of the people, oppoſed the law with all his intereſt. Cinna therefore ordered the new citizens to come to the comitium with daggers under their robes, being reſolved to get the law paſſed by force. Octavius, being informed of theſe unwarrantable proceedings, reſolved to oppoſe force with force; and accordingly went to the forum, attended by a numerous body of old citizens, with arms concealed under their garments. He no ſooner appeared in the forum, than the new citizens, at the inſtigation of Cinna, fell upon him with great fury. Octavius ſtood his ground; whereupon a battle enſued, in which, as the two parties were ſhut up in a narrow compaſs, much blood was ſhed. At length the new citizens were overpowered, and driven from ſtreet to ſtreet, till they abandoned the city, together with the conſul Cinna, and ſix tribunes of his faction. We are told that Sylla, cited to give an account of his conduct, ſets ſail for Aſia.

Cinna raiſes new diſturbances.

A battle in the forum.

° Appian. bell. civil. l. i. Vell. Paterc. l. ii. Val. Max. l. ix.

that ten thouſand of the new citizens were killed in this battle. Cinna, being thus driven from the capital, had recourſe to the neighbouring cities, ſoliciting troops and money to maintain what he called the cauſe of the allies. As ſoon as he was gone the ſenate depoſed him, and choſe L. Cornelius Merula conſul in his room. This new inſult quickened him in his application to the allies, who all concurred with uncommon chearfulneſs to ſupply him with troops, or money to hire them. The great ſums he received enabled him to corrupt a conſiderable body of Roman troops, that lay encamped in the neighbourhood of Capua. They all joined him to a man, and took the military oath, which he adminiſtered to them in his conſular habit, as if he had not been depoſed. When the allies heard, that he was at the head of a Roman army, they flocked to him from all parts of Italy, in ſuch crowds, that in a ſhort time he had no fewer than thirty legions under his banners; a prodigious army! able to make all Italy tremble. And now Cinna reſolved to recall the proſcribed; and accordingly diſpatched an expreſs to Marius, who was ſtill in the little iſland of Cercina, acquainting him, that he might return to Italy, without fear of the ſenate and their decrees. This ſtep alarmed the conſcript fathers, who immediately ordered the two conſuls, Octavius and Merula, to fortify both the city and citadel, by placing all the baliſtæ and catapultæ in the magazines on the walls. They were alſo commiſſioned to raiſe what forces they judged neceſſary, and to take into the ſervice ſuch of the confederates as had not declared for Cinna. At the ſame time, the fathers recalled Pompeius Strabo, who was yet making war with ſome ſmall remains of the revolted Italians on the coaſts of the Adriatic ſea, and was at the head of a very numerous army, the command of which he had kept after the murder of the conſul Pompeius Rufus; but that general, not being yet determined what party to take, affected delays, and carried himſelf ſo artfully, that no-body knew what ſide he favoured. Some writers are of opinion, that his true deſign was to let the two factions waſte each other, and then raiſe himſelf upon the ruins of both [P]. In the mean time, Marius, putting to ſea with all expedition, landed at Telamon, a port in Hetruria, with a body of Mauruſian horſe

Cinna ſolicits ſuccours from the allies.

Marius recalled.

Marius lands in Italy.

[P] Oroſ. l. v. c. 19.

horſe raiſed in Africa. Upon the news of his arrival, great numbers of ſhepherds, ſlaves, and men of deſperate fortunes, flocked to him from all parts; ſo that he ſoon ſaw himſelf at the head of a conſiderable army. He then ſent a meſſenger to Cinna, ſignifying to him, that he was ready to acknowledge him for conſul, and aſſiſt him to the utmoſt of his power againſt their common enemies. Cinna immediately acquainted Sertorius with the arrival of Marius, and the tenders he made him of his ſervice. Sertorius, having been diſobliged by Sylla, who had employed all his intereſt againſt him when he ſtood for the tribuneſhip, had joined the contrary faction, and at this time, as he was a brave and experienced officer, ſhared the command of the army with Cinna. He was a man of great prudence and moderation; and therefore dreading the rough and revengeful temper of Marius, he adviſed Cinna not to admit him into his army, remonſtrating, that Cinna was powerful enough, without the addition of Marius's undiſciplined troops, to triumph over his enemies; that he could not make Marius his aſſociate, without making him his maſter; that he was inſatiably covetous of glory, and ever ready to envy it in his competitors; that he would aſſume to himſelf all the ſucceſs of the war; and laſtly, that he was a man in whom it was not always ſafe to confide. All this Cinna owned to be true; But how, ſaid he, can I ſend back a man, who, upon my word, has left Africa, and whom I myſelf have invited to join his reſentments with ours againſt our common enemies? Since you yourſelf had invited him to your aſſiſtance, replied Sertorius, there was no need of this conſultation. The only thing we can do now is, to watch his conduct as narrowly as we do the deſigns of our moſt inveterate enemies. After this ſecret conference, Cinna ſent back the meſſenger to Marius, ſtyling him proconſul in his letter, and empowering him to chuſe lictors for his guard; but Marius, putting on the appearance of great humility on this occaſion, refuſed the title, the lictors, and all other marks of the proconſular dignity, as not agreeing with his preſent circumſtances. He affected on the contrary to wear nothing but an old gown; his hair and beard rough; he walked with a ſlow pace, like a man quite oppreſſed with his misfortunes: but through the diſguiſe of that mournful countenance, ſomething ſo fierce appeared in his looks, looks, that he rather created terror, than moved compaſſion [q].

Cinna gives Marius the title of proconſul.

Rome blocked up by Cinna, Marius and Sertorius.

AND now Cinna, Marius, and Sertorius took each their province in this new war. In a council of war they reſolved to march directly to the capital. Cinna was to block it up on the ſide of the Tiber; Sertorius to inveſt it on the oppoſite ſide; and Marius to ſcour the country, and prevent any proviſions from being conveyed into the city either by land or water. Pompeius Strabo was encamped with his army before the gate Collina, to cover the city on that ſide. This politic general had offered Cinna his ſervice and his army, thinking that his party was moſt likely to prevail; but Cinna, looking upon him as a time-ſerver, in whom it was not ſafe to confide, had rejected his offer with ſcorn; which obliged him to take part with the conſuls Octavius and Merula.

The firſt hoſtilities.

As he was encamped near Sertorius, the firſt act of hoſtility began between theſe two generals; but it was rather a ſkirmiſh than a battle, there being killed only ſix hundred men on both ſides. This rencounter, however, was remarkable for an accident, which ought to have given the Romans a diſtaſte for civil wars: two brothers, who had choſen oppoſite parties, meeting in the heat of the action, the one gave the other a mortal wound without knowing him; but when he heard the voice of his dying brother, he ran to embrace him, and finding him at the laſt gaſp, Dear brother, he cried out, tho' different intereſts have divided us, one common pile ſhall unite us. This ſaid, he plunged into his own body the ſword, which was yet ſtained with the blood of his brother, and died by his ſide. This moving accident made ſome impreſſion on the ſoldiery; but paſſion and party-zeal, or rather fury, ſoon hardened all hearts; ſo that all regard to friends and relations was laid aſide by both parties [r].

Rome in the utmoſt confuſion.

As Cinna's forces encreaſed daily, he formed a fourth army which he put under the command of Papirius Carbo. This filled the city with dread and confuſion. The two conſuls who defended it, Octavius and Merula, were men of great probity, and much better qualified to maintain the laws and religion in their purity, than to ſuſtain the attacks attacks of an enemy. Octavius was ſo ſcrupulous an obſerver of the moſt venerable cuſtoms in Rome, that they in vain preſſed him, even in this criſis, to arm the ſlaves in defence of the city. They could only get this anſwer, That he would not make ſlaves free of that city, from which, in maintenance of the laws, he was driving away Marius. He was indeed a man of good ſenſe and underſtanding, and ſupported the dignity of his office with a becoming majeſty; but placed too great a confidence in auguries, and was more intent on conſulting divines, than men ſkilled in military affairs. As for Merula, he placed more confidence in the protection of Jupiter, whoſe flamen he was, than in the valour of the many brave men he had under his command. The ſenate therefore had recourſe to Cæcilius Metellus, the ſon of Metellus Numidicus, who was making war upon the revolted Samnites with a conſiderable body of Roman troops. The ſenate, well acquainted with the ability and courage of that general, ſent him orders to put an end to that war upon as honourable conditions as he could, to march his army immediately to the relief of his country, and, if he could not conclude a peace, to leave his troops under the command of his lieutenants, and return himſelf to Rome. Metellus, purſuant to his orders, immediately entered into a treaty with the Samnite generals; but, while the negotiation was carrying on, Marius, by offering the Samnites more advantageous terms than Metellus had done, gained them over to his party; ſo that Metellus, leaving his forces to his lieutenants, returned to the capital, where he no ſooner appeared, than the ſoldiers, diſſatisfied with the indolence of the conſuls, loudly demanded him for their general, declaring, that under the conduct of ſo brave a commander, they did not fear repulſing the enemy, and ſaving Rome; but Metellus, as modeſt as brave, rejected theſe ſeditious applauſes with indignation, upbraided the ſoldiers with want of diſcipline, and openly declared, as he was too ſtrictly obſervant of the old cuſtoms and laws, that he would not aſſume an office, which properly belonged to the conſuls. This made many of the citizens deſpair of being able to defend the city; and they deſerted in companies to Cinna, whoſe generals were not ſo ſcrupulouſly virtuous. Sertorius was the only man among them who had any noble ſentiments; the others had neither honour nor virtue. In the mean time, Marius made himſelf maſter of all the maritime places in the neighbourhood of Rome, took Oſtia itſelf by treachery, pillaged it, put moſt of the inhabitants to the ſword, and building a bridge over the Tiber, cut off all communication between the city and the ſea. He then marched with his army towards the city, and poſting himſelf on the Janiculum, blocked it up on that ſide [f].

[q] Plut. in Mario & Sertorio. Appian. bell. civil. l. i. [r] Oroſ. l. v. c. 19. Liv. epit. ibid.

the

Marius takes Oſtia.

Tho' the capital was greatly weakened by daily deſertions, yet Octavius found means to raiſe a conſiderable army in it, with which he encamped under the walls, as did likewiſe Q. Metellus and Pompeius Strabo, each of them commanding a ſeparate body. Cinna, who ſcrupled no attempt, how villainous ſoever, which could ſerve his cauſe, undertook to get Pompeius Strabo aſſaſſinated in his tent; but his ſon ſaved his life; which was the firſt remarkable action of Pompey the Great. Young Pompey, who was making his firſt campaign under the proconſul his father, had choſen for his companion one Terentius, a patrician of his own age. The treacherous Cinna, by many alluring promiſes, gained over Terentius to his intereſt, and prevailed upon him to undertake the aſſaſſinating of the general and his ſon, and at the ſame time the debauching of his army, and carrying the legions to Sylla's camp; but young Pompey, receiving notice of this wicked deſign a few hours before it was to be put in execution, placed a faithful guard round the prætorium; ſo that none of the conſpirators, who had deſigned to ſet fire to the general's tent, could come near it. He then watched all the motions of the camp, and endeavoured to appeaſe the fury of the legionaries, who hated their general, by ſuch acts of prudence as were worthy the oldeſt commanders. Some of the mutineers had forced open one of the gates of the camp, in order to deſert to Cinna. Hereupon the general's ſon, laying himſelf flat on his back in their way, cried out, That they ſhould not break their oath and deſert their commander, without paſſing over his body. By this means he put a ſtop to their deſertion, and afterwards wrought ſo effectually upon them by his affecting ſpeeches and engaging carriage, that he reconciled them to his father [t].

Pompey ſaves his father's life.

In the mean time, Marius, who was encamped on the Janiculum, uſed his utmoſt efforts to make himſelf maſter of the ſtrong fort built on that hill, and was very near ſucceeding in his attempt by the treachery of one Appius Clau-

Marius makes a fruitleſs attempt on the Janiculum.

[f] Plut. Appian. Liv. ibid. [t] Plut. in Pomp.

Claudius, a military tribune in the place, who, having formerly received some favours of Marius, opened one of the gates to him; but the garrison, tho' surprised, made a brave resistance, and in the mean time, Octavius and Pompeius Strabo hastening to their relief, a sharp engagement ensued, which ended wholly to the advantage of the consular troops [u].

Pompeius Strabo killed by lightning.

NOTWITHSTANDING this advantage, the city was soon reduced to a most deplorable condition: a plague broke out among the troops of Pompeius with such violence, that in a few days it carried off eleven thousand men. Soon after the general himself was killed with lightning, which did a great deal of mischief in his army. As Pompeius was a very wicked man, capable of the greatest crimes, and had assassinated a consul before the altar, the people, looking upon his death as a punishment upon him from heaven, dragged his body with an iron hook through all the streets of the city, and then threw it into the Tiber [w]. The command of his army was given to L. Crassus, who, together with Octavius and Metellus, went and encamped near the hill Alba along the Appian way, with a design to open a communication with the country on that side; but Cinna, Marius, Sertorius, and Carbo, joining their forces, posted themselves above the consular troops on the same Appian way; so that no provisions could be conveyed from the country to the city. And now a famine beginning to be felt in the capital, the people complained loudly of the senate, as if they kept up a war for their own private interest, which exposed them, their wives, and children to the danger of being starved. To make the disorder in Rome still greater, Cinna treated under-hand with the citizens, and, by his emissaries, prevailed upon most of the slaves to shake off their master's yoke, and take refuge in his camp, where they were declared free. The example of the slaves was followed by citizens of all ranks, who, abandoning the defence of the city, deserted openly and in large companies. The same spirit of mutiny and desertion reigned in the consular army, which visibly decreased; insomuch, that Metellus, despairing of being able to save Rome, left the camp, and retired into Liguria, whence he soon after passed over into Africa. The senate, seeing their party and authority daily declining, and fearing a general insur-

Rome reduced to great straights.

[u] Plut. in Appian. ibid. [w] Vell. Paterc. l. ii. c. 21. Jul. Obseq. c. 116.

inſurrection, thought it time to come to a treaty with Cinna; and accordingly ſent deputies to his camp, with ſome overtures of peace. Cinna, before he would hear them, aſked, whether they were come to treat with him as conſul, or only as a private man? This queſtion, which they did not expect, ſurpriſed them; and, as they had no inſtructions touching ſo nice a point, they deſired leave to return to Rome to conſult the ſenate. The conſcript fathers were greatly perplexed, not knowing what anſwer to give, nor what courſe to take. They thought it inconſiſtent both with honour and juſtice to depoſe Merula, a wiſe magiſtrate, whom they had in a manner compelled to quit the office of high-prieſt of Jupiter, and accept of the conſulſhip. On the other hand, as the city was cloſely blocked up on all ſides, and the famine encreaſed daily, without any hopes of relief, it was to be feared, that the populace would riſe, and let the enemy into the city. In this dilemma, Merula himſelf, preferring, like a good citizen, the welfare of his country to his own honour, freely abdicated, and by his abdication left the ſenate at liberty to acknowledge Cinna for lawful conſul. Accordingly, the conſcript fathers ſent back their deputies to him, with inſtructions to treat with him as conſul, and to invite him to Rome, to exerciſe there the functions of his dignity; however, they were ordered to require of him an oath, that he would ſpare the blood of the citizens, and put no Roman to death but by due form of law. Cinna refuſed to take that oath; but proteſted, that he would never give his conſent to the death of any citizen. He even ſent word to the conſul Octavius, that he would not do amiſs to retire from the city till the ſtorm was blown over. During this conference, Marius, who ſtood by, ſaid nothing; but the ſourneſs of his countenance and the ſternneſs of his looks threatened the city with blood and ſlaughter. As ſoon as the meſſengers were diſmiſſed, Cinna, Marius, Sertorius, and Carbo began their march at the head of their troops, and advanced towards the city, the ſenate having ordered the gates to be opened to them. Cinna entered the city with a ſtrong guard; but Marius halted at the gate, and when he was preſſed to advance, he replied with a ſarcaſtical tone, That he was a baniſhed man, and conſequently debarred by the laws from entering; that therefore, if they had any occaſion for his ſervice, they muſt get that law repealed, which drove him into exile. Hereupon Cinna marched directly to the forum; and having aſſem-bled the people, propoſed to them the diſannulling of the decree which proſcribed Marius and his adherents; but Marius, impatient to ſhed the blood of his enemies, when only two or three tribes had voted, pulled off the maſk, and, without waiting for a lawful repeal, entered the city, ſurrounded by his guards, choſen from among the ſlaves, who had flocked to him, and whom he called his Bardiæans (R).

Cinna acknowledged conſul.

Cinna and Marius enter Rome.

Marius's cruelty.

The firſt order he gave theſe cruel and inhuman aſſaſſins was, immediately to murder all thoſe, who, coming to him and meeting him in the ſtreets, ſaluted him, and were not anſwered with the like civility. This ſignal was a general dead warrant, and great numbers of the flatterers, who came to make their court to the new tyrant, were cruelly maſſacred before his eyes. Q. Ancharius, a ſenator of great diſtinction, who had been honoured with the prætorſhip, choſe to pay his compliments to Marius when he was offering a ſacrifice in the capitol; but the tyrant caſting a fierce look upon him, he was inſtantly cut in pieces in the very temple of Jupiter. Cinna, for the preſent, exerciſed his cruelty only on his collegue Octavius, who ſtill took upon him to perform the functions of his office, and was therefore, at the inſtigation of Cinna, ſlain in his curule chair by Cenſorinus. But Marius's Bardiæans, or Bardiates, ſet no bounds to their luſt, cruelty, and avarice: they firſt murdered their former maſters, abuſed their children, and inſulted their wives in the groſſeſt manner; then they extended

(R) We are at a loſs to know how Marius came to give his guards this name. Thuanus, as appears from a note in the margin of his Plutarch, thought there was a fault in the text, and that, inſtead of Bardiæans, we ought to read Bardyetes or Bardyates; for the Bardyetes were a moſt barbarous and ſavage nation in Spain, and this might very naturally induce Marius to call his guards by that name, on purpoſe to frighten the people, and make them tremble at the fierceneſs of their nature. There is a good deal of reaſon for this conjecture. However, M. Dacier, in her notes on Plutarch, offers another: Plutarch tells us, ſays ſhe, that the greateſt grievance of the people was the abominable licentiouſneſs and infamous debaucheries of thoſe guards. It may therefore not abſurdly be conceived, that Marius on that account, called them not his Bardiæans, but Bardeans, from the Greek word Βαρδῆν, which, in the Ambracian dialect, ſignifies to raviſh women. But, after all, this may be refining too much on the matter, as the ſame writer obſerves. Perhaps Plutarch wrote not Βαρδιαῖος, but Μαριαῖος, that is, the Marians, or the life-guard of Marius.

tended their cruelty and licentiouſneſs to all ranks of perſons, not ſparing the moſt venerable matrons in the republic; and carried their iniquities to ſuch an exceſs, that Cinna and Sertorius, having conſulted together how to rid Rome of this barbarous crew, reſolved to put them all to death; and accordingly ſent a detachment to ſurpriſe them, one night while they were aſleep in the camp, and cut them all off to a man. Marius was much grieved at the loſs of his favourite guard; and being afraid, as he breathed nothing but blood, that Cinna had already ſatisfied his revenge, he deſired the heads of the faction to meet, in order to deliberate what kind of government they ſhould ſettle, ſince all the power was devolved upon Cinna after the death of his collegue. At his requeſt, Cinna, Carbo and Sertorius came to confer with him; and in this conference Marius is ſaid to have ſpoke like a madman. Sertorius, the only man among them who had any good principles or ſenſe of morality, endeavoured to moderate his fury; but in vain: Cinna and Carbo concurred in his ſentiments, and the reſolution they took, was to murder, without mercy, all the ſenators who had oppoſed the popular faction. Purſuant to this reſolution, C. Attilius Serranus, P. Lentulus, Caius and Lucius Cæſar, C. Numitorius, and M. Bæbius, all ſenators of great note, were murdered in the ſtreets. P. Craſſus, a young ſenator, endeavoured to make his eſcape; but being cloſely purſued by Caius Fulvius Fimbria, one of the moſt furious zealots of Marius's party, his father meeting him, killed him, for fear he ſhould fall into the hands of his enemies, and then preſented himſelf before the bloody Fimbria, by whom he was inhumanly maſſacred. This ſlaughter laſted five days, during which time the beſt part of the ſenators were cut off, their heads were ſtuck upon poles over-againſt the roſtra, and their mangled bodies dragged with hooks into the forum, where they were left to be devoured by the dogs. However, Metella, the wife of Sylla and daughter of Metellus Numidicus, and her children eſcaped this general ſlaughter. Marius indeed cauſed a ſtrict ſearch to be made after them; but they eluded the vigilance and fury of the tyrant, being privately conveyed out of town by ſome of Sylla's friends. Marius, highly exaſperated at their eſcape, cauſed their houſe to be razed, their goods confiſcated, and Sylla himſelf to be declared an enemy to his country. While Marius was thus venting his brutal rage on Sylla's friends in the city, his ſoldiers, the miniſters of his cruelty, Proſcriptions, murders, &c.

were, like ſo many blood-hounds, diſperſed about the country, in ſearch of thoſe who had fled. The neighbouring towns, villages, and all the high-ways, ſwarmed with aſſaſſins. On this occaſion Plutarch obſerves with great concern, that the moſt ſacred ties of friendſhip and hoſpitality are not proof againſt treachery in the days of adverſity; for there were but very few who did not diſcover their friends, who had fled to them for ſhelter. He therefore, with a great deal of reaſon, commends and admires the fidelity of the ſlaves of Cornutus in that general defection. Cornutus had retired to a houſe in the country; and his faithful ſlaves, obſerving a company of ſoldiers hovering about the neighbourhood, concealed their maſter in the moſt private part of the houſe; and then taking up the body of one, whom the tyrant's officers had juſt murdered, carried it to the houſe, hung it up by the neck, put a gold ring on the finger, and ſhewed it in that condition to the ſoldiers, pretending it was the body of their maſter. They then buried it with great pomp and ſolemnity; and by this innocent artifice, which was perceived by no-body, they ſaved Cornutus, and conveyed him into Gaul. Marcus Antonius, grandfather to the triumvir, and the greateſt orator that had appeared in Rome till his time, was not ſo fortunate. He fled to the houſe of a faithful friend in the country, who endeavoured to ſave his life with great tenderneſs and affection. His friend was in low circumſtances; but, being proud of having under his roof one of the greateſt men in Rome, reſolved to entertain him in the beſt manner he could. Accordingly he ſent his ſervant to a tavern in the neighbourhood for ſome of the beſt wine he could get. The vintner perceiving the ſervant nicer than uſual, taſting of ſeveral ſorts, and not ſatisfied but with the very beſt, aſked him, What made him ſo hard to pleaſe? The ſervant told him in confidence, as his truſty friend and acquaintance, That the wine was for the illuſtrious Marcus Antonius, who made ſo great a figure in the ſenate. My maſter, ſaid he, keeps that great man concealed in his houſe, and is reſolved on this occaſion to ſtretch his purſe, and make as much of him as he can. The ſervant was no ſooner gone, than the villain of a vintner went to Marius, who was then at ſupper, and told him, he could deliver Antonius into his hands. At this news Marius gave a great ſhout, clapped his hands for joy, and was for riſing from table and going to the place himſelf; but, being prevented by his friends, he ſent Anius, one of his wicked agents, attended by a body body of ſoldiers, commanding him to bring Antonius's head with all ſpeed. Anius himſelf waited at the door, and ſent in his ſoldiers to diſpatch the orator and bring him his head; but the aſſaſſins, notwithſtanding their natural barbarity, were ſo ſtruck at the ſight of this great man, and moved with the graces and charms of his eloquence, when he began to ſpeak and plead for his life, that tears dropped from their eyes, and none of them would touch him. Anius, impatient at their delays, went into the room, and ſeeing his ſoldiers all weeping, and quite ſoftened by the eloquence of that great orator, checked them ſeverely, and with his own hand cut off his head, and carried it to Marius, who, after he had made it matter of ſport to his gueſts, ordered it to be ſtuck up on a pole with the reſt before the roſtra. Such was the end of the greateſt orator Rome had ever bred. Cicero, who had often heard him, being at this time about twenty years old, calls him the wonder of his age, and adds, that to him it was owing, that Italy equalled Greece itſelf in the art of ſpeaking [w].

The fidelity of Cornutus's ſlaves.

Marcus Antonius betrayed and murdered.

And now the rage of the other tyrants, after ſo many murders began to abate. But Marius ſtill thirſted after more Roman blood. He wanted to deſtroy two men, who had been both honoured with the faſces. Theſe were Lutatius Catulus, who had been his collegue in the conſulate, and partner in the triumph over the Cimbri; and the virtuous Cornelius Merula, who had generouſly reſigned the conſular dignity to make room for Cinna. Great intereſt was made for Catulus; but to all thoſe, who interceded for him, Marius returned this cold anſwer, He muſt die. Hereupon Catulus, ſhutting himſelf up in a room, ſmothered or poiſoned himſelf. Merula likewiſe robbed his enemy of the cruel pleaſure of putting him to death. As he was high-prieſt of Jupiter, he went to the temple of that god, laid down his mitre, in which it was not lawful to die, and, then ſeating himſelf in his pontifical chair, ordered his veins to be opened. After he had bled ſome time, he advanced to the altar, ſprinkled it with blood, and uttering many imprecations againſt the tyrants, devoted them to Pluto and the infernal gods.

Catulus and Merula kill themſelves.

The conſulate of Cinna being near expiring, the citizens, who had ſeen the ſtreets for ſome time flowing with blood, and covered with heaps of dead bodies, hoped for Cinna names himſelf and Marius conſuls.

ſome

[w] Plut. in Mario. Appian. bell. civil. l. i. Cic. in Bruto & alibi paſſim.

ſome reſpite. But Cinna, unwilling to truſt them with chuſing him a ſucceſſor, of his own authority nominated himſelf and Marius conſuls for the next year. Accordingly on the calends of January, they took poſſeſſion, one of his ſecond, the other of his ſeventh conſulſhip. Marius was now ſeventy years of age; but neither his ambition nor his cruelty were yet ſatiated. As he was coming out of his houſe to be inveſted, according to cuſtom, in his office, Sextus Licinius unhappily fell in his way, and was by his orders immediately thrown down from the Tarpeian rock. The ſame day he proſcribed two prætors; and his ſon, no leſs cruel than himſelf, killed the ſame day a tribune of the people with his own hand [x].

Sylla writes to the ſenate.

In the mean time, news came from all parts, that Sylla, having put an end to the war with Mithridates, was returning into Italy at the head of a great army. Soon after the ſenate received a long letter from the victorious general, wherein, with a lively ſtyle, he gave them an account of his victories, and complained of the injuries done him. After enumerating the many ſervices he had done the republic in her wars with the king of Numidia, with the Cimbri, the allies, and laſtly with Mithridates, the moſt powerful king in the eaſt, he concluded thus: For theſe important ſervices you have rewarded me, by ſetting a price upon my head; my friends are murdered without mercy; my wife and children are forced to abandon their native country; my houſe is razed; my goods confiſcated; and all the laws made in my conſulſhip abſolutely diſannulled. You may expect, conſcript fathers, to ſee me in a little time at the gates of Rome with a victorious army. And then I ſhall find means to revenge the perſonal injuries I have received; and to inflict ſignal puniſhments both on the tyrants themſelves, and the miniſters of their tyranny. This letter gave the two conſuls a great deal of uneaſineſs. Marius, now worn out with hardſhips and years, could no longer bear up his ſpirits flagging at the apprehenſion of a new war, which his own experience repreſented to him as very dangerous. He conſidered, that he had not now to do with an Octavius or Merula, at the head of an undiſciplined rabble, but with Sylla, who was approaching with a victorious army, and who had once before driven him out of Rome. At the ſame time he called to mind all his paſt misfortunes, his flight, his baniſhment, the many dangers he Marius dreads the arrival of Sylla.

[x] Plut. Appian. ibid.

he had undergone, his tedious wanderings, &c. and, dreading to be expoſed a-new to the ſame hazards in ſo advanced an age, he fell into great troubles, nocturnal frights, and broken ſlumbers, fancying every moment that he heard a voice, telling him, that the den, even of an abſent lion, ought to be dreaded. To divert theſe tormenting thoughts, he had recourſe to a remedy ſcarce known in thoſe days, but too common in ours. He gave himſelf up to exceſſive drinking, chuſing rather to loſe his reaſon, than to be continually haunted with melancholy thoughts. This new way of living ſoon bred a diſtemper which led him to his grave. Poſidonius the philoſopher, as quoted by Plutarch, tells us, that, having over-heated his blood by too much drinking, he fell into a pleuriſy. The ſame philoſopher adds, that he went to his houſe, when he was confined to his bed, and diſcourſed with him about ſome affairs relating to his embaſſy at Rome. But Caius Piſo ſeems to inſinuate that he himſelf haſtened his end, though he does not tell us in what manner. He only relates, that Marius, walking one night after ſupper with ſome of his friends, entertained them with a recital of all his adventures, which he concluded with ſaying, that it did not become a man of his years to truſt any longer ſo unconſtant a goddeſs as fortune. Having ended his diſcourſe, he embraced all about him with a tenderneſs very uncommon to him, went home, and took to his bed. He was ſeized with a delirium, during which, fancying himſelf general in the war againſt Mithridates, he uſed ſuch motions and geſtures as if he had been engaged in battle at the head of an army. At length after ſeven days illneſs he died, ſome ſay on the ſeventeenth, others on the thirteenth day of his ſeventh conſulſhip.

He gives himſelf up to exceſſive drinking.

His death.

And now the diſtreſſed city fondly imagined, that the inteſtine calamities, which had reduced her to the laſt extremity, were buried with Marius. But ſhe ſoon perceived, that ſhe had only changed her tyrant. Cinna, the ſurviving conſul, aſſociated with himſelf in the government, though not in the office of conſul, young Marius, who, as he had inherited the cruelty of his father, put all the ſenators he could find in Rome or its neighbourhood to the ſword. As all the power was lodged in the hands of Cinna and young Marius, they got Valerius Flaccus, a creature of old Marius, named to ſucceed him in the conſular dignity. He no ſooner entered upon his office, than he paſſed a moſt unjuſt law in favour of the people, declaring all debtors free from their debts, upon paying to their creditors

Young Marius ſucceeds his father.

ditors one fourth of what they owed. Having by this law gained the affections of the indigent multitude, the new conſul conſulted with Cinna and Marius, how they ſhould prevent the return of Sylla, who had under his command a victorious and well-diſciplined army. The expedient they agreed on to put it out of the power of that general to give them any uneaſineſs, or to obſtruct their wicked meaſures, was, to nominate a perſon to ſucceed him in the command of the army in the eaſt, under pretence, that his authority was illegal, ſince he had been proſcribed by a decree of the ſenate. Purſuant to this ſcheme, the new conſul Valerius Flaccus was appointed to command the Roman forces in the Levant, and make war with Mithridates. But, as Valerius was no ſoldier, Cinna and Marius gave him for his counſellor and lieutenant C. Fulvius Fimbria, a ſenator, greatly eſteemed by the troops for his valour. Fimbria, though entirely addicted to the Marian faction, both deſpiſed and hated Valerius. However, he prepared to attend him, in compliance with the orders of Cinna and Marius, who were abſolute maſters in Rome. A ſquadron of ſhips was ſent with a conſiderable number of troops on board, with orders to land in one of the ports of Theſſaly, and there wait for Valerius, who was to follow with the reſt of the army. Sylla was at that time buſy in reſettling Greece, after having defeated Archelaus and Taxiles, two of Mithridates's generals. The troops therefore that were to ſerve under Valerius, hearing of Sylla's victories, inſtead of waiting for their unexperienced commander, deſerted all to a man, and joined the victorious proconſul, under whoſe conduct they promiſed themſelves great booty and glory. When news of this deſertion was brought to Rome, it was reſolved there, that Valerius ſhould embarque with two legions, and ſail directly for Aſia to carry on the war there with Mithridates. However, he did not leave Rome before December, towards the end of his conſulſhip, which was no ſooner expired, than Cinna, without ſo much as aſſembling the comitia, declared himſelf conſul the third time, and choſe for his collegue Papirius Carbo, one of the moſt furious zealots in Rome for the Marian faction. The other chief dignities in the republic were all filled with men wholly devoted to the intereſt of the reigning tyrant. In ſhort, the face of the republic was entirely changed, and the antient laws and inſtitutions quite aboliſhed. All the friends of Sylla, whom the tyrants could get into their power, were inhumanly murdered, and their eſtates confiſcated.

The conſul Valerius Flaccus appointed to command the forces of the republic, in the room of Sylla.

Cinna declares himſelf conſul the third time with Papirius Carbo.

cated. Men of any honour or probity were ashamed to live in a city, which was now become a nest of robbers and assassins. They therefore fled in crowds, and retired to Sylla in Greece, imploring his protection against their domestic tyrants. Upon their arrival Sylla hastened to put an end to the war with Mithridates, which we have described at length in our history of Pontus. But, before the articles of peace were agreed on, Valerius Flaccus arrived with his two legions at Byzantium, being sent by Cinna to take upon him the command of the Roman forces in the Levant, and to pursue the war with Mithridates. He was scarce landed, when great differences arose between him and his lieutenant Fimbria about their quarters. The lieutenant, sensible of the want of abilities in his general, despised him, and stirred up the soldiery to mutiny. Hereupon Valerius deposed him, and appointed one Thermus in his room. Fimbria, provoked at this affront, kept no bounds with his general, who, as he was hated by the soldiery for his harsh temper, thought it adviseable to retire for some time from the army; and accordingly crossed the Bosphorus, and took up his quarters in Chalcedon. The audacious Fimbria followed him thither with the greatest part of the army; which Valerius no sooner heard, than suspecting his design, he fled to Nicomedia, shut the gates, and put himself in a condition to sustain a siege against his subaltern. Fimbria pursued him, made himself master of Nicomedia, and finding him concealed in a well, dragged him out, and killed him with his own hand. Cinna and his senate, instead of punishing, rewarded the villainy, by declaring the base assassin general of all the Roman troops in the Levant [y].

Valerius Flaccus arrives at Byzantium.

Is murdered by his lieutenant Fimbria.

And now Fimbria, seeing himself at the head of a consular army, without any regard to the treaty, which was near concluded between the king of Pontus and Sylla, renewed the war with great vigour. He defeated young Mithridates in a pitched battle, and obliged the king himself to take shelter behind the walls of Pitane, a strong city on the confines of Æolis and Troas. Thither Fimbria pursued him, and having invested the place by land, sent messengers to Lucullus, Sylla's quæstor and faithful friend, entreating him to prevent with the fleet, which he commanded, the king's retreat by sea. Had Lucullus complied with his request and shut up the mouth of the harbour, the proud Mithridates Fimbria makes war upon Mithridates with success.

[y] Appian. bell. civil. & in Mithridatic. Liv. epit. l. lxxxii. c. 64. Plut. in Sylla & Lucullo.

thridates muſt have fallen into the hands of the Romans. But Lucullus, deteſting the very name of Fimbria, ſailed away, and left an open retreat to the king, when he might have eaſily taken him, and by that means prevented the bloody war, which that prince carried on for the ſpace of forty years with the republic. However, Fimbria took Pitane and ſeveral other places, treating the inhabitants with unparallelled inſolence and cruelty, as we have related at length in our hiſtory of Pontus. In the mean time, Sylla, having put the laſt hand to the peace in a conference with the king at Dardanus, marched againſt Fimbria, whom he found encamped under the walls of Thyatira in Lydia. And now two Roman armies ſeemed ready to entertain the Aſiatics with a battle among themſelves in the heart of Aſia. Sylla, advancing within two furlongs of Fimbria's camp, ſent him a ſummons, to ſurrender up his troops to him, deveſt himſelf of the command, and return to Italy. Fimbria proudly anſwered, that he deſpiſed the orders of a proſcribed man, who was declared by the ſenate an enemy to his country. Hereupon the two generals began to prepare for a battle; but Fimbria's men declaring, that they would not take arms againſt their countrymen and friends, and great numbers of them deſerting to Sylla, the treacherous Fimbria reſolved to have his adverſary aſſaſſinated. But the ſlave he employed for that baſe purpoſe betrayed himſelf by the terror that appeared in his looks, and then diſcovered the treachery of his maſter. This barbarous attempt exaſperated Sylla to ſuch a degree, that he immediately led his legions to attack the traytor in his trenches. Fimbria, finding his ſoldiers ready to abandon him, deſired a conference with Sylla. But he, not caring to come near a traytor, who was capable of any deſperate attempt, only ſent Rutilius, one of his officers, to treat with him, and acquaint him, that if he would leave Aſia and deliver up his troops, he would not only ſave his life, but furniſh him with all neceſſaries for returning to Italy. Return to Italy! replied Fimbria; no, I know a more expeditious way. Having uttered theſe words, he retired to his tent, and ſoon after privately withdrew to Pergamus, where he ſtabbed himſelf with his own ſword in the temple of Æſculapius. But, the wound not proving mortal, a faithful ſlave, who attended him, diſpatched him, and then plunged the ſword into his own breaſt [z].

Fimbria's men deſert to Sylla.

Fimbria's treachery.

He kills himſelf.

AND

[z] Plut. in Sylla. Appian. in Mithridat. Liv. epit. l. lxxxiii. c. 32.

And now Sylla, having no more enemies to contend with in Aſia, reſolved to return to Italy, where Cinna and Papirius Carbo had appointed themſelves conſuls for the next year. The former, to eſtabliſh himſelf more firmly in his uſurped authority, married his daughter Cornelia to a young patrician, whoſe extraordinary talents were already admired in Rome. This was the famous Julius Cæſar, who afterwards followed the ſteps of his father-in-law; and being no leſs wicked, and more ſucceſsful, turned at laſt the republic into a monarchy. Sylla, before he left Aſia, wrote a letter to the ſenate of great temper and moderation; but when their deputies came to meet him at Dyrrachium, and entreat him not to carry his reſentment ſo far as to produce a civil war, he ſpoke a very different language, telling them, that he was coming to Rome full of rage and revenge; and that all his enemies, if the Roman people conſented to it, ſhould periſh either by the ſword, or the axes of the common executioners. Hereupon the two conſuls ordered Marius, and the other heads of the party, to raiſe forces and recruit the legions. Several armies were raiſed with incredible expedition, the new citizens and allies readily concurring to ſupport the cauſe of the conſuls, which they looked upon as their own. A fleet was likewiſe brought from Sicily to guard the coaſts of Italy. In a council of war, at which all the leading men of the party aſſiſted, it was reſolved, that one of the conſuls ſhould go and meet Sylla before he entered Italy, and carry the ſeat of war into Dalmatia. This Cinna took upon himſelf, and accordingly cauſed ſome of his forces to be immediately tranſported thither. But the reſt of his ſoldiers refuſed to go on board, and began to mutiny. Cinna aſſembled his troops in order to appeaſe them, when one of the lictors, who ſurrounded the conſul as uſual, ſtruck a ſoldier who drew too near to the general. The ſoldier returned blow for blow, and called his comrades to his aſſiſtance. Upon this the ſtones flew about, and the legionaries who were next to the conſul, fell upon him ſword in hand. Cinna fled, but a centurion overtaking him, buried his ſword in his body [a] (S).

The ſenate ſend deputies to Sylla.

Cinna killed by one of his ſoldiers.

Upon

[a] Liv. Appian. ibid. Auth. de vir. illuſtr.

(S) Plutarch relates this matter very differently. He ſays, that Pompey came to Cinna's camp, and that the cold reception he met

UPON the death of Cinna, Carbo continued ſole maſter of the adminiſtration, till the end of the year. His firſt care was to bring back the troops which his collegue had ſent into Dalmatia. He then ordered new levies to be made in all the cities of the allies and in the Roman colonies, to keep Sylla out of Italy by force of arms. We are told, that the troops raiſed for this purpoſe amounted to two hundred thouſand men. They were divided into ſeveral bodies commanded by different generals; viz. L. Cornelius Scipio and C. Junius Norbanus, whom Carbo had got choſen conſuls, Appius Claudius, Sertorius, young Marius, Flavius Fimbria, the brother of that Fimbria who had killed himſelf in Aſia, M. Marius, Albinovanus, and Lucius Brutus Damaſippus. In the mean time, Sylla was preparing to embarque at Dyrrachium, now Durazzo, where he had ordered his fleet, conſiſting of an hundred and twenty ſail, to wait for him. When every thing was ready, he aſſembled his troops, and in the harangue he made to them, gave them by ſeveral hints to underſtand, that he was under ſome apprehenſion, leſt they ſhould diſperſe, and retire to their reſpective homes, as ſoon as they found themſelves on their native ſhore. Hereupon the whole army of their own accord took a new oath, promiſing to ſtand by him to the laſt, and to commit no devaſtations in Italy, which might raiſe the country againſt him. They even offered him all the gold and ſilver they had got in the war with Mithridates. But Sylla, thanking them for their generoſity, declined their offer, and being now well aſſured of their fidelity and affection, he embarqued, and put to ſea, as he himſelf tells us, againſt fifteen generals and four hundred and fifty cohorts. He had a proſperous paſſage, and landed his troops to the number of forty thouſand men at Brunduſium and Tarentum, without meeting with any oppoſition. There the army reſted a few days, to refreſh themſelves met with there giving him reaſon to believe that his life was not ſafe, he privately withdrew. His abſence raiſed great murmurs in the army, the ſoldiers imagining, that Cinna had ſacrificed him to his jealouſy. This report being ſpread among the troops, they firſt demanded young Pompey with loud clamours, and then fell with great fury on the general, whom they charged with his death, and cut him to pieces (11)

Several armies raiſed againſt Sylla.

Sylla lands in Italy.

(11) Plut. in Pomp.

themſelves after the fatigues of the ſea, and then began their march croſs Calabria and Apulia in ſearch of the enemy. On his march he was joined by Metellus Pius, who, during the tyranny of old Marius, had fled into Liguria. Sylla, who had no other title but that of proconſul, received him as his collegue, and both advanced at the head of the army into Campania, keeping their troops under the moſt exact diſcipline. The conſul Norbanus was encamped between Capua and Caſilinum, in order to ſtop Sylla's march; which the proconſul no ſooner underſtood, than he diſpatched two of his officers to him with offers of a pacification. Whether he was really inclined to concord, or artfully diſſembled the rage he concealed in his heart, is uncertain. However that be, his offers were rejected, and his deputies groſsly inſulted, which ſo incenſed Sylla's troops, that they ran to arms without orders from their general, drew up in battalia, and went out to inſult Norbanus in his camp. Hereupon an action enſued, in which the conſul was defeated, and ſix thouſand of his men killed on the ſpot. The fame of this action drew many of the contrary faction to Sylla's camp, and amongſt the others Cethegus, Verres, and Piſo, all three men of great diſtinction, and hitherto moſt furious zealots of the Marian faction. Verres, who was quæſtor of the proconſul Carbo's army, brought with him his military cheſt, a preſent very acceptable to Sylla. But, in the mean time, the conſul Scipio drawing near, the proconſul's army was in a manner ſurrounded by the innumerable forces of the enemy. In this diſtreſs Sylla had recourſe to his old artifice of pretending to treat of peace; and accordingly ſent deputies to the conſul's camp to propoſe an accomodation, pretending, that he was much grieved at the calamities to which the republic muſt be expoſed by a civil war. Scipio, who was ſincerely diſpoſed to peace, hearkened to the overtures that were made him, and by way of preliminary agreed to a truce, during which, there being a free intercourſe between the two camps, Sylla's men found means to debauch the whole conſular army; inſomuch, that when Sylla detached twenty cohorts, as it were to force the conſul's trenches, the conſular troops, all to a man came out to meet them, and joining them marched back with them to Sylla's camp. The conſul and his ſon, being deſerted by their whole army, which conſiſted of forty cohorts, were ſeized by Sylla's ſoldiers, who delivered them up to their general. But he, being under no apprehenſions from commanders, who could be ſo eaſily over-reached, ſet them both at liberty, and gave them a guard to conduct them ſafe to the neareſt quarters of their friends. When news of this general deſertion was brought to Carbo, who was then encamped in Ciſalpine Gaul, he cried out in great ſurpriſe, We have both a fox and a lion to deal with; but the fox is more formidable than the lion [b].

Pompey makes his firſt appearance.

THE news of the great advantages Sylla was daily gaining, over the generals of the adverſe party, prompted young Pompey to declare for him. He aſſembled troops in Picenum, where his family had a great many friends and clients, and taking upon him, of his own authority, the title of general, though he was then but twenty-three years of age, obliged moſt of the towns of Picenum to declare for Sylla. The ſmall army he commanded encreaſed ſo faſt, that in a ſhort time he had men enough to form three legions; and at the head of theſe, after he had appointed them their tribunes and centurions, he advanced towards Campania to join Sylla. The march of the brave youth, which was ſignalized by the reduction of many cities, drew upon him three generals, who commanded the armies in that neighbourhood under the conſuls. Carinas, Cœlius, and Brutus agreed to obſtruct his march by attacking him in different places. Brutus oppoſed him the firſt with a conſiderable army, conſiſting chiefly of Gauliſh horſe. But Pompey at the head of his own cavalry defeated that of the Gauls, after having killed with his own hand the Gaul who commanded them. He then fell ſword in hand on Brutus's infantry, cut moſt of them in pieces, and forced the reſt to ſave themſeves by a diſorderly flight. This ſucceſs which was chiefly owing to the young general's perſonal bravery, ſo damped the courage of the two other generals, that they reſolved to quit the field, and leave the country open to the conqueror. However, he had not advanced far before he was met by the conſul Scipio, who ſince the deſertion of his troops had raiſed a new army. But the infantry on both ſides were no ſooner in fight, than the conſul's troops went all over to the young hero; ſo that Scipio deſerted a ſecond time by his army, was forced to retire with ſhame. Pompey's name being now become formidable to the adverſe party, Papirius Carbo, quitting Gaul, haſtened after him, in order der to prevent his joining Sylla. His cavalry came up with him at the river Æſis, which divides Picenum and Umbria; but the young general having repulſed them with great vigor, purſued his march, and at laſt reached Sylla's camp, where he was received with all poſſible demonſtrations of eſteem and ſincere friendſhip. Sylla, charmed with the account he gave him of his exploits, honoured him, though he had not yet a ſeat in the ſenate, with the title of Imperator, which the legionaries gave but rarely to their braveſt generals. Rome being greatly alarmed at the encreaſe of Sylla's army, the two conſuls as well as Carbo drew near it, in order to keep up their party there, and defend the city in caſe of an attack. The conſul Norbanus encamped without the walls, on the road to Campania; and Carbo, entering Rome at the head of his army, forced the ſenate to declare Metellus, Pompey, and all the patricians who had joined Sylla, enemies to their country. The reſt of the campaign was employed on both ſides in private negotiations, each party endeavouring to debauch the allies of the other. Sylla, a great maſter in that art, ſent conſiderable ſums into Ciſalpine Gaul, and by that means gained over ſeveral Gauliſh nations to his intereſt. On the other hand, the oppoſite faction ſent Sertorius into Spain, to keep thoſe vaſt provinces in awe, and prevent them from declaring for Sylla. At the ſame time, young Marius prevailed on the Samnites to join him with an army of forty thouſand men, under the command of Pontius Teleſinus, an able commander, who had gained great reputation in the war of the confederates [c].

[b] Plut. Appian. ibid.

Papirius Carbo and young Marius conſuls.

AND now, the conſular year being near expired, Carbo, who tyrannized at Rome without controul, forced the tribes to chuſe himſelf and young Marius conſuls for the next year. As the winter, which was very ſevere, ſuſpended hoſtilities on both ſides for ſome months, the conſuls made it their whole buſineſs to raiſe money for the ſupport of the troops, which they had levied in moſt of the provinces of Italy. But, the public treaſury being quite exhauſted, they extorted a decree from the ſenate, empowering them to ſtrip the temples of their ornaments, and turn all the gold and ſilver they found in them into money. The conſuls having now wherewithal to pay their troops, and the rigor of the ſeaſon being abated, their armies took the field, and went in queſt of the enemy. The firſt battle was fought on the banks of the Æſis, between Carinas, one of the conſul's generals, and Metellus Pius, who was immoveably attached to Sylla. The action proved very bloo-Carina's defeated by Metellus.

[c] Appian. Liv. Plut. ibid.

dy, and laſted from morning to night. But Metellus at length obliged Carinas to retire, and ſoon after made himſelf maſter of his camp. The news of this defeat exaſperated young Marius to ſuch a degree againſt Sylla and his adherents, that he ſent orders to Junius Brutus, then prætor in Rome, to put all Sylla's friends in the city to death. This order was executed with the utmoſt cruelty; not one of thoſe, whom the inhuman prætor could get into his power, was ſpared. Among the ſlain were Papirius Carbo, the conſul's brother, P. Antiſtius, father-in-law to Pompey, L. Domitius, and the great Mucius Scævola, pontifex maximus. The latter took refuge in the temple of Veſta; but the prætor's agents followed him thither, and murdered him at the foot of the altar. The account Sylla received of theſe cruelties made him reſolve to quit Campania, and draw near to Rome. Accordingly, he advanced to Setia on the banks of the Liris, where he was met by young Marius at the head of eighty-five cohorts. Sylla reſolved, contrary to the advice of all his officers, to venture an engagement, being encouraged by a dream, in which the night before he imagined to ſee old Marius adviſing his ſon to beware of the following day, which might be of fatal conſequence to him. Both armies engaged with great intrepidity, and fought with unparallelled bravery. The ſucceſs was long doubtful; but at length Marius's right wing Marius defeated by Sylla.

The cruelty of young Marius.

gave way, and the diſpute was ended by the deſertion of ſeven of his cohorts, who all in a body went over to Sylla. Their example drew many others, which ſtruck the conſular army with ſuch terror, that they all betook themſelves to flight, and diſperſed about the fields. The conqueror purſued them, and made a dreadful ſlaughter of the fugitives. The vanquiſhed, ſeeing themſelves cloſely pur-

Marius flies to Præneste.

ſued, fled to Præneste in ſuch numbers, that the inhabitants were forced to ſhut the gates before the conſul arrived; ſo that he was drawn up with a cord, and by that means eſcaped for the preſent the fury of his purſuers. All the reſt, who were left without the walls, periſhed by the ſwords of the enemy. Sylla, as quoted by Plutarch, tells us in his memoirs, that on this occaſion twenty thouſand of the enemy were killed upon the ſpot, and eight thouſand taken priſoners; whereas he loſt in all but three and twenty men [d].

SYLLA

[d] Plut. in Sylla.

SYLLA, flattering himſelf that he ſhould put an end to the war by taking Marius, inſtantly inveſted Prænesſte: but, as the place was too ſtrong to be taken by aſſault, he reſolved to reduce it by famine; and with this view he ſurrounded it with a broad and deep ditch, placing guards at proper diſtances to prevent the conveying in of any proviſions. He committed the care of the blockade to one Lucretius Ofella, a ſoldier of fortune, whom he had lately gained over from Marius's party. As for himſelf, he marched with a ſtrong detachment towards Rome, which, he was informed, the friends of Marius had abandoned upon the news of his defeat. The citizens, oppreſſed with famine and all the calamities that attend a civil war, opened the gates to him; ſo that he entered the city without oppoſition, and encamped in the Campus Martius. And now, ſeeing himſelf maſter of the capital, he aſſembled the people, complained to them of the injuſtice done him by his enemies, confiſcated the eſtates of all thoſe who adhered to Marius, promoted his friends to the offices he found vacant by the flight of thoſe who had oppoſed him; and then, without ſtaining his firſt coming to the capital with any acts of cruelty, returned to his camp before Prænesſte. In the mean time, Carbo, having raiſed a numerous army in Ciſalpine Gaul and Hetruria, drew near to Prænesſte, with a deſign to throw ſuccours into the place. But Sylla meeting him, a bloody action enſued, which laſted from ſun-riſing to ſun-ſet, without any advantage on either ſide. During the engagement, Marcius Cenſorinus, one of Carbo's generals, at the head of eight legions, attempted to force the enemy's trenches in another quarter; but he was repulſed by Pompey and Craſſus. A few days after, theſe two generals were attended with equal ſucceſs againſt C. Albinius Carinas, whom they defeated, after having killed five thouſand of his men. Sylla's other generals gained ſtill greater advantages in ſeveral parts of Italy. The two Servilii beat the conſular troops near Cluſium; Marcus Lucullus defeated another army near Fidentia; and Metellus gained a ſignal victory over the united forces of Carbo and Norbanus in the neighbourhood of Faventia. Ten thouſand of them were cut in pieces, and ſix thouſand went over to Metellus. Upon the news of this defeat, a legion, which lay at ſome diſtance from Metellus's camp under the command of Albinovanus, immediately forſook him, and joined Metellus. Hereupon Albinovanus, thinking himſelf no longer ſafe in the party he had embraced, abandoned it in Prænesſte inveſted.

Sylla enters Rome.

Great advantages gained by Sylla and his generals.

The treachery of Albinovanus.

ſo criminal a manner as has made his name infamous. He invited Norbanus, his general, C. Apuſtius, Flavius Fimbria, and moſt of the chief officers of his party, to an entertainment. Norbanus was prevented, by an unforeſeen accident, from complying with the invitation; and this ſaved him; for the reſt, when they were in the height of their jollity and mirth, were barbarouſly maſſacred by a band of aſſaſſins, whom the traytor had hired for that purpoſe. Such are the effects of party-zeal and domeſtic diſſenſions. Albinovanus, thinking himſelf ſufficiently recommended to Sylla by this black piece of treachery, withdrew to his camp with all the accomplices of his crime.

Norbanus flies to Rhodes, where he kills himſelf.

Norbanus, not knowing any longer whom to truſt, went on board a veſſel, which he found ready to ſet ſail for Rhodes, and arrived ſafe in that iſland. Sylla ſent immediately to demand him of the Rhodians; but, while they were deliberating how to behave in ſo nice an affair, Norbanus prevented their coming to a determination by ſtabbing himſelf in the middle of the market-place [e].

In the mean time, Carbo, after having attempted ſeveral times in vain to relieve his collegue Marius cloſely beſieged in Præneſte, retired into Hetruria to reinforce his army there with new levies. But while he was encamped near Cluſium, news was brought him, that M. Lucullus had, with ſixteen cohorts, defeated fifty cohorts of his beſt troops, under the command of Quinctius, in the neighbourhood of Placentia, killed eighteen thouſand of them, and taken their camp. This misfortune ſtruck Carbo with ſuch terror, that, deſpairing of ſucceſs in Italy, he withdrew privately from his army, though thirty thouſand ſtrong, and with a few friends embarqued for Africa, to carry on the war there. Upon the news of his flight, Pompey and the Servilii haſtened to attack the army he had left in the neighbourhood of Cluſium, which, as it was deſtitute of a general, made but a faint reſiſtance; twenty thouſand men were killed upon the ſpot, and the reſt either taken or diſperſed. And now one of the three chief ſupporters of the Marian faction being dead, another fled, and the third ready to periſh with want in an inveſted town without any hopes of eſcaping, Sylla began to think the war at an end. But a new enemy, more brave and reſolute than any Sylla had yet encountered, entering the liſts againſt

Carbo retires to Africa.

[e] Plut. in Sylla. Appian. de bell. civil. l. i. Vell. Patercul. l. ii.

againſt the conqueror, had like to have humbled him, and turned the ſcales in favour of the oppoſite party. This was Pontius Teleſinus, a Samnite of noble extraction and great experience in war; who having raiſed an army of forty thouſand men, partly Lucanians and partly Samnites, joined them to thoſe of Carinas, Brutus, and Cenſorinus; and with theſe three chiefs advanced boldly to make a laſt effort, and either relieve Marius in Prænefte, or periſh in the attempt. Sylla, being informed of their motions, advanced to meet them at the head of his victorious army, and at the ſame time ſent orders to Pompey, who commanded another body, to follow Teleſinus, and fall on his rear, while he attacked him in front. The Samnite, finding himſelf in a manner ſurrounded by two armies, ſo that he could neither advance nor retire, without being attacked by both at the ſame time, decamped ſilently in the night, and overreaching the two generals, inſtead of purſuing his march to Prænefte, took the rout to Rome, which he knew was not in a condition to ſuſtain a ſiege. His march was ſo expeditious, that before break of day he came within ten furlongs of the Collatine gate. His approach threw the city into the utmoſt confuſion. The gates were immediately ſhut; the men ran to arms and appeared on the walls; the women all in tears crouded to the temples to implore the aſſiſtance of the gods. Teleſinus was a ſecond Hannibal at the gates of Rome, and already thought himſelf maſter of it. He then pulled off the maſk, and ſhewing himſelf as much an enemy to Marius as to Sylla, declared to his troops, who were moſtly Samnites and Lucanians, that his deſign was not to aſſiſt one Roman againſt another, but to extirpate, if poſſible, the whole nation, utterly deſtroy the proud city, and bury its inhabitants under the ruins. He walked through all the lines and ranks of his army, encouraging his men to lay hold of the opportunity which offered of humbling the proud republic, and putting her out of a condition of pretending to lord it over the reſt of Italy. Let fire and ſword, ſaid he, deſtroy all; let no quarter be given; mankind can never be free ſo long as one Roman is left alive. His troops, fired by ſuch a ſpeech, advanced with great fury. The Roman youth marched out to oppoſe them under the conduct of Appius Claudius, a young patrician of noble extraction and great hopes. But he was killed, and the reſt forced back into the city with great ſlaughter. In the mean time, Sylla, receiving intelligence of the enemy's march, detached Teleſinus the Samnite joins the generals of the Marian faction.

Overreaches Sylla and Pompey, and marches to Rome.

He repulſes the Romans.

ſeven hundred horſe under the command of Balbus, with orders to ride full gallop to Rome, and throw themſelves into the city, while he advanced with the utmoſt expedition at the head of all the infantry of his army. The arrival of Balbus raiſed the drooping ſpirits of the citizens, who had given themſelves up for loſt. But the ſudden appearance of Sylla at the head of his army occaſioned ſuch joy among all ranks of men as can hardly be expreſſed. He arrived about noon, and encamped near the temple of Venus. After he had allowed his men a few minutes to refreſh themſelves, he called them again to arms, and drew them up in order of battle. Dolabella and Torquatus, two of his lieutenants, endeavoured to diſſuade him from expoſing his troops, haraſſed and ſpent as they were, to a deſperate puſh, when all lay at ſtake. They remonſtrated to him, that he had not a Marius or a Carbo to deal with, but an experienced general at the head of the Lucanians and Samnites, two of the moſt warlike nations in Italy, and the moſt inveterate enemies of the Roman name. But Sylla, without hearkening to their remonſtrances, ordered the trumpets to ſound the charge, and began the attack. The fight was the ſharpeſt and moſt bloody that had happened during the whole courſe of the war. The Samnites, animated by the example of the brave Teleſinus, behaved with their uſual valour, and put the left wing of the Romans, where Sylla himſelf commanded, into great confuſion. Several cohorts fled, and entire legions, not able to keep their ground againſt the Samnites, who puſhed them with incredible vigor, began to retire. Sylla did all that lay in his power to rally them, and bring them back to the charge. He even preſented himſelf ſword in hand before the runaways to ſtop their flight. But all in vain; the legionaries, who had behaved ſo gallantly in Aſia, without any regard to the command or danger of their general, thought only of ſaving themſelves by a ſhameful flight, ſome of them haſtening back to their camp, and others ſtriving to get into the city. The Samnites made a dreadful havock of the fugitives, and Sylla himſelf narrowly eſcaped death. As he was flying from line to line mounted on a white courſer, two Samnites, knowing him by his equipage, levelled their javelins at him, which one of his attendants perceiving, gave his horſe a laſh, which made him bounce forwards ſo ſeaſonably, that the javelins juſt grazed upon his tail, and fell deep into the ground at ſome diſtance from him. In this imminent danger Sylla took Sylla haſtens to the relief of the city.

Engages Teleſinus.

Sylla's left wing defeated.

Sylla in great danger.

took out of his bosom a little golden image of Apollo, which he brought from Delphos, and constantly carried about him in all engagements; and as danger and fear usually awaken religious sentiments, he addressed himself to it in the following words; Great Apollo, the Pythian, thou who hast granted Cornelius Sylla victory in so many engagements, and raised him to the highest pitch of glory, hast thou at last brought him to the very gates of his native city to fall there ignominiously with his fellow-citizens? He then endeavoured anew to rally the fugitives; some of them he threatened, others he conjured only to face about, and look on the enemy. But when he found all was to no purpose, and that the left wing was entirely broken and put to flight, he had no resource but in a retreat; and accordingly endeavoured with the rest to gain the camp, after having lost a great number of his friends, and some of the most considerable officers of the army. A great many of the citizens likewise, whose curiosity had led them out to be spectators of the engagement, were trod under foot by the enemy's horse; others were shut out and left at the mercy of the victorious Samnites, and some, among whom were several senators, stifled in the crowd. A great many of the fugitives retired to the camp before Prænestе, which they filled with terror, reporting, that Sylla was certainly killed, his army cut in pieces, and Rome in the hands of the Samnites [e].

Sylla forced to fly to his camp.

In the mean time, M. Crassus, who commanded the right wing of the Roman army, having put to flight Carinas, who commanded the enemy's left, fell unexpectedly upon the victorious Samnites, charged them with unparalleled bravery, overpowered them, and at length by putting them to flight, saved, we may say, Rome from undergoing the fate of Carthage and Corinth. Sylla was defeated; Rome was not in a condition to stand a siege; and the brave Samnite, not knowing the fate of his left wing, was advancing to the gates of the defenceless city, crying out to his soldiers, as they marched along, Courage, my brave Samnites, courage! we shall be soon masters of Rome. There is no safety for us, till we have destroyed that den of wolves, which watch all opportunities to devour us. And indeed, had it not been for Crassus, this great metropolis had been buried in its ruins, and liberty restored to the rest of the world. The Samnites, now no more more conquerors, but conquered, fled to Antemnæ, whither Craſſus purſued them, and from thence ſent an expreſs to acquaint Sylla with his victory. In this engagement Teleſinus was killed at the head of his troops, after having given ſuch proofs of valour, as intitle him to a place among the greateſt heroes of antiquity. Carinas, Brutus, and Cenſorinus, were all taken priſoners, and ſoon after beheaded by Sylla's orders. That general, upon notice given him by Craſſus of the defeat and flight of the enemy's army, haſtened to Antemnæ, and there, as he had now no enemy to fear, he gave the firſt inſtances of his cruel and barbarous temper. For as he approached the place, three thouſand of thoſe unhappy wretches, who had taken ſhelter there, having ſent deputies to him, entreating him to ſpare their lives, and promiſing him an inviolable fidelity, the cruel general anſwered, that he would ſpare their lives, provided they put ſuch of their comrades to death as refuſed to join them. Upon this they fell upon their fellow-ſoldiers ſword in hand, killed a great number of them, and then preſented themſelves before Sylla without arms, and in the poſture of ſuppliants. He pretended to pardon them, and carried both thoſe who had ſurrendered, and the reſt, to the number of ſix, or, as Appian will have it, eight, thouſand men, to Rome, which he entered amidſt the acclamations of the people. Upon his arrival he cauſed thoſe unfortunate wretches to be ſhut up in the circus, and then ſummoned the ſenate to meet in the temple of Bellona, which ſtood near the circus. When the fathers were met, he began to harangue them; but while they were hearkening with great attention to his ſpeech, his troops, purſuant to their orders, entered the circus and fell ſword in hand on the unfortunate priſoners confined there. The cries and groans of ſo many men butchered in ſo narrow a place alarmed the ſenators, who were not acquainted with his orders, and filled them with terror. But Sylla, with great unconcern and compoſure in his countenance, addreſſing himſelf to the conſcript fathers, Attend, ſaid he, to what I am ſaying, and don't trouble your heads about what is doing without doors: the noiſe you hear is occaſioned by ſome offenders, whom I have ordered to be chaſtiſed. He then continued his diſcourſe with great calmneſs, telling the fathers, that he deſigned to ſettle the republic upon the ſame foot on which it ſtood in the beſt of times. But when the ſenators were informed of the maſſacre in the circus, they plainly ſaw, that they were ſtill under tyranny, and had only changed their tyrant, which Teleſinus is killed.

The Samnite army defeated by Crassus.

[e] Plut. & Appian. ibid.

Sylla's cruelty.

which was to them matter of no leſs ſurpriſe than grief and terror. For in Sylla the nobility had hoped to find a friend, and the people a protector. He had been from his youth inclined to mirth, and was not only of a jovial, but of ſo compaſſionate a temper, that he had been often ſeen to weep upon very ſlight occaſions. But the change of fortune introduced, in a manner, a change of nature, and begot pride, arrogance, inhumanity, and all thoſe vices, which generally ſpeaking, attend an uncontrouled power and authority.

THE inhabitants and garriſon of Prænеſte no ſooner heard of the defeat of Teleſinus, than they delivered up the city to Ofella. Marius endeavoured to make his eſcape through ſome ſubterraneous paſſages; but finding them all guarded, where they opened into the country, by Sylla's ſoldiers, he laid violent hands on himſelf, as ſome writers tell us, to avoid falling into the power of his enemies. Others ſay, that Pontius Teleſinus, brother to him who commanded the Samnite army, and the young conſul engaged in a ſingle combat with a deſign to kill each other, and that Pontius falling firſt, Marius ordered a ſlave to kill him. His head was brought to Sylla, who looking upon it with an air of arrogance and contempt, What did this raſh boy mean, ſaid he, in pretending to govern the rudder, before he had learned to handle the oar? His head was afterwards by Sylla's orders expoſed in the forum to inſpire terror. All the Samnites and Prænеſtines able to bear arms were put to the ſword, and the city was given up to be plundered; ſo that from being one of the moſt populous and rich cities of Italy, it became at once the moſt poor and deſolate. Plutarch tells us, that Sylla upon the news of the ſurrender of Prænеſte haſtened thither, in order to bring the inhabitants and Samnite priſoners to a formal trial, that he might put them to death with ſome ſhew of juſtice. Accordingly, he began with citing each particular perſon before his tribunal, and, after hearing their defence, pronounced ſentence like an impartial judge. But finding this a work of too much time, he ordered them all, to the number of twelve thouſand men, to be cooped up cloſe in one place, and gave a general order for their execution. They were all inhumanly maſſacred in the preſence of the tyrant, who beheld that cruel butchery, and heard the cries and groans of thoſe unfortunate men, with as much calmneſs and unconcern, as if he had been aſſiſting at a public ſhow. He was pleaſed to except one out of the number of the victims, Prænеſte ſurrenders.

Marius killed.

Sylla's cruelty towards the Prænеſtines.

tims, and offer him his life, becauſe he had formerly entertained him at his houſe. But the generous Prænestine rejected the offer with the utmoſt indignation; I ſcorn, ſaid he, to owe my life to the butcher of my country. This ſaid, he mixed with his fellow-citizens, and periſhed in the general ſlaughter. About the ſame time Norba, a city of Campania, being after a long ſiege reduced to the laſt extremity by Æmilius Lepidus, one of Sylla's generals, the inhabitants, dreading the fate of the Prænestines, ſet fire to their houſes, and periſhed with all their effects in the flames [f].

Norba taken

THE taking of Præneste and Norba put an end to the civil war in Italy. Sylla therefore, having placed in all the Italian provinces ſuch governors, as were entirely at his devotion, and pitched ſeveral little camps in different diſtricts to keep the country in awe, returned to Rome, which he entered at the head of his troops. The ſame day he aſſembled the people in the comitium, and told them with a haughty air, that he had conquered; but that thoſe who had made him take arms againſt his country, ſhould expiate the blood they had made him ſhed, with their own. I will not ſpare one, ſaid he, who has borne arms againſt me. They ſhall all periſh to a man. Theſe words from a man, who was abſolute maſter of their lives and fortunes, made the moſt intrepid tremble. They filled the whole city with dread and horror; and the conſternation was doubled the next day, when they ſaw fixed up in all public places a liſt of proſcribed perſons, containing the names of forty ſenators and ſixteen hundred knights. If any man gave ſhelter to a perſon proſcribed, though his ſon, his brother, or his father, death was the certain reward of his humanity; whereas the aſſaſſin was recompenced with two talents, tho' a ſlave had murdered his maſter, or a ſon his father. The children and grand-children of thoſe he proſcribed were by an edict declared infamous, and their eſtates confiſcated. The tyrant choſe ſuch agents to execute his decrees, as had even leſs pity than himſelf. The chief of theſe was the infamous Catiline, whoſe ſeditious enterpriſes we ſhall relate hereafter. That profligate wretch, though yet very young, had ſome time before killed his brother; and now, to juſtify his crime, he prevailed upon Sylla to inſert his brother's name among the proſcribed. This favour ſo attached him to the tyrant, that he became the chief inſtrument of

His ſpeech to the people in comitium.

His proſcriptions.

Catiline the miniſter of his cruelties.

[f] Plut. Appian. ibid. Diodor. Sicul. in excerpt. Vell. Paterc. l. i.

of all his cruelties. At the head of a band of aſſaſſins, he ſcoured the ſtreets, and killed many knights and ſenators before they knew they were proſcribed. The perſons named in the liſt were ſought for in their own houſes, in the porticos, and even in the temples, whence they were dragged to Sylla, and cruelly butchered in his preſence. Nor was the maſſacre confined to thoſe named in the liſt. Sylla extended his revenge to all who had borne arms againſt him, of what rank ſoever or condition. Nay, his cruel agents took this opportunity to gratify their private revenge and avarice, confounding the moſt innocent and peaceable with the moſt guilty, out of ſome private grudge, or purely for the ſake of their wealth and rich furniture. In ſhort the ſlaughter was ſo dreadful, that Sylla was reproached with it even by his beſt friends. Among others a young ſenator, named Caius Metellus, ventured one day to aſk him in full ſenate, when he deſigned to put a ſtop to the calamities of his fellow-citizens? We do not, ſaid he, interceede for ſuch as you have reſolved to deſtroy; but only deſire you to free thoſe from their uneaſineſs whom you have determined to ſave. Sylla, without ſeeming to take this bold ſpeech amiſs, anſwered cooly, that he knew not yet whom he ſhould ſave. Name to us then, replied Metellus, thoſe you have determined to deſtroy. That I will do, anſwered Sylla very ſmartly, and immediately cauſed a new liſt to be fixed up of eighty citizens whom he proſcribed, moſt of them ſenators and perſons of great diſtinction. The next day he proſcribed two hundred and twenty more, and an equal number the third. Among theſe were Carbo, Scipio, Sertorius, and Marcus Marius; the three former were out of the tyrant's reach; but the latter, who was nearly related to the great Marius, and highly favoured by the people, was ſeized by Catiline and put to death, after having ſuffered the moſt exquiſite torments tyranny could invent. He was whipped through all the ſtreets of Rome, and after this ignominious puniſhment carried beyond the Tiber, where by Sylla's barbarous agents his eyes were put out, his hands and ears cut off, his tongue tore out, all his joints diſlocated, and his bones broken. Valerius Maximus tells us, that one Marcus Plætorius, being moved at ſuch an affecting ſight, could not help pitying the unfortunate young man; which ſo offended Sylla, that he ordered him to be killed upon the ſpot. Even that natural compaſſion for the unhappy, which no man of any humanity can prevent,

Rome turned into a ſhambles.

Metellus's courage.

M. Marius put to a cruel death.

vent, was judged criminal and worthy of death (T). And now, after nine thouſand ſenators, knights, and citizens had been inhumanly murdered by Sylla's agents, he aſſembled the people, and told them, that he had proſcribed as many as he could think of at preſent; and as for thoſe he had forgot, they ſhould be proſcribed too, as ſoon as he could call them to his memory [g].

FROM Rome, Sylla extended his cruelties to the neighbouring cities that had declared againſt him, and uſed them without mercy. Some were diſmantled, others oppreſſed with heavy taxes, and immenſe ſums raiſed upon the inhabitants. All the effects of the inhabitants of Florentia, Spoletum, Interamna, and Sulmona, were confiſcated and ſold to the beſt bidder. Some cities were entirely demoliſhed, and the citizens all to a man proſcribed. The allies as well as the Romans ſubmitted, without reſiſtance, to the tyrannical yoke. Cato alone, known afterwards by the name of Cato Uticenſis, or Cato of Utica, though at this time but fourteen years of age, diſcovered ſome remains of the old Roman ſpirit. As Sylla ſhewed a great regard for him on account of his antient friendſhip with his father, his governor

[g] Plut. Appian. ibid. Flor. l. iii. c. 21. Seneca de ira. Plin. l. xxxiv. Oroſ. l. viii.

(T) Marius was ſcarce expired in his torments, when Catiline cut off his head, and carrying it as a trophy into the forum, preſented it to Sylla, while he was haranguing the people. The tyrant received the ſhocking preſent, and beheld it without ſhewing the leaſt concern. As for Catiline, his hands being daubed with the blood he had ſhed, he went and waſhed them in the holy or luſtral water, placed at the gate of Apollo's temple (12). For the heathens had veſſels placed at the gates of their temples filled with water, which they called luſtral or holy. In this water ſuch as intended to go into the temple waſhed their hands by way of purification. They likewiſe ſprinkled it on the aſſembly to cleanſe them from their impurities. An excluſion from the uſe and benefit of this luſtral water was looked upon by the Greeks as a kind of excommunication. For this reaſon OEdipus, in the firſt ſcene of the ſecond act in Sophocles, forbids thoſe who had been guilty of the death of Laius the uſe of the luſtral water. But here the profligate Catiline, after the murder he had committed, waſhes his hands in that water intending by ſuch an impious action to affront and defy religion.

(12) Plut. in Sylla.

vernor Sarpedo brought him frequently to the tyrant's houſe, which looked like a priſon, great numbers of citizens being confined there, and many daily executed. One day the young Roman ſeeing a great many heads preſented to the tyrant, which were ſaid to be of great men, he aſked his governor how it was poſſible that the author of ſo many murders could eſcape being murdered himſelf? Becauſe he is more feared, replied Sarpedo, by the diſheartened citizens, than hated. Give me a ſword then, anſwered the intrepid youth, and I will with one blow deliver my country from the tyrannical yoke. Sarpedo was ſurpriſed at the courage of his pupil, but ever after kept a watchful eye over him, leſt he ſhould by ſome raſh attempt expoſe himſelf and his family to utter deſtruction [h].

The noble ſpirit of young Cato.

While Italy was thus groaning under the oppreſſion of the tyrant, Pompey was employed againſt his enemies in Sicily, which was governed by Perperna, Carbo's friend, a man greatly attached to the Marian faction. But, upon Pompey's landing, he abandoned the iſland and retired to Carbo then in Africa. The Sicilians no ſooner heard of his flight, than they came in crowds from all parts of the iſland to make their ſubmiſſions to Pompey. Catanea was the only city that ſeemed determined not to ſubmit. But Pompey having begged of the inhabitants as a favour to admit into their city his ſick men, and they complying with his requeſt, he ſent the flower of his troops, and by that means made himſelf maſter of the place. In the mean time, Carbo not thinking himſelf ſafe in Africa, retired to the iſland of Coſſura between Sicily and Africa, with a deſign to paſs from thence into Egypt. But Pompey, being acquainted with his deſign, ſent a ſquadron of galleys to inveſt the iſland, ordering his officers to ſeize Carbo and all the outlaws who attended him, and bring them to Sicily. Carbo, finding he could not eſcape, came and ſurrendered himſelf to the commander of the ſquadron. He had formerly ſaved Pompey's eſtate, which the tribunes were for confiſcating, on his father's being convicted of having embezzled the public money. He could not therefore believe, that party-zeal had effaced all ſenſe of gratitude in the heart of a friend. But he found, to his great ſurpriſe, a man, whom he had highly obliged and ſaved from beggary, become, through his attachment to Sylla, his implacable enemy.

Sicily ſubmits to Pompey.

Carbo taken and put to death by Pompey.

The

[h] Plut. in Cat.

The young general ordered the old magiſtrate, who had been dignified with three conſulates, to be brought before him loaded with chains; ſuffered him to fall proſtrate at his feet, and received his ſubmiſſions with ſuch an air of pride as was ſhocking even to his friends. After he had reproached him with his cruelties, and the diſturbances he had raiſed in the republic, he pronounced ſentence of death againſt him, which was immediately put in execution. However, he ſuffered moſt of thoſe Romans who were taken with Carbo, to make their eſcape; which with his prudent and mild conduct towards the Sicilians, gained him the affections of the people. Upon his threatening to puniſh the inhabitants of Himera with great ſeverity, for having been more ſanguine than the reſt of the Sicilians in the cauſe of Marius and Carbo, Sthenis, their chief magiſtrate, told him, that he was the man who had ſtirred up his fellow-citizens againſt Sylla, and that therefore he alone ought to be puniſhed. Pompey was ſo taken with this generous freedom, that he not only pardoned him, and for his ſake the city, but received him into his friendſhip. As his ſoldiers, accuſtomed to ſlaughter, put many of the Sicilians to death without his orders, he cauſed their ſwords to be ſealed up in their ſcabbards, and ſeverely puniſhed thoſe whoſe ſeals were found broken. By theſe acts of clemency towards the Sicilians, he wiped off the reproach of inhumanity and ingratitude, which he had brought on himſelf by the death of Carbo. Nay, it was generally thought, that his behaviour towards the chief ſupporter of the Marian faction was much againſt his inclination and the bent of his good-nature. At leaſt it is certain, that he made no enquiries after his friends in Sicily, and that he not only connived at the eſcape of many who were ſeized, but conveyed them away privately himſelf [i].

Pompey by his clemency gains the hearts of the Sicilians.

And now Sylla, being abſolute maſter of Rome and all the countries ſubject to the republic, except Spain, reſolved to leave the ſenate and people a ſhadow at leaſt of their former liberty. To this end he retired into the country for ſome days, deſiring the conſcript fathers to chuſe one of their own body in his abſence to govern the commonwealth, which, ſince the death of the conſuls, had had no legal magiſtrate. The fathers, out of complaiſance to Sylla, created L. Valerius Flaccus inter-rex: he was preſident of the ſenate, and wholly devoted to Sylla's intereſt; and this gave him an opportunity of bringing the ſenate to execute the ſcheme he had formed. He wrote to Valerius, deſiring him to declare to the ſenate and people, that, ſince affairs were yet unſettled, he was of opinion, that a dictator ſhould be created, not for any limited time, but till all evils and grievances were redreſſed. In his letter he intimated, that at the requeſt of the conſcript fathers he would accept of the employment. This propoſal, which tended to the eſtabliſhing of regal authority in Rome, ſurpriſed the ſenators. But the remembrance of ſo much bloodſhed, of ſo many proſcriptions and aſſaſſinations, chilled every heart; and, the law paſſing without oppoſition, Sylla was declared dictator without any limitation in point of time. Thus the Romans, after many ages, fell again under the abſolute power of one man; which proved a fatal blow to the republican government, and paved the way to abſolute monarchy. As flattery is the uſual conſequence of ſlavery, the people formerly ſo jealous of their liberty, worſhipped the idol they had ſet up, erecting to their tyrant an equeſtrian ſtatue of braſs in that very comitium, where they had ſeen the heads of ſo many illuſtrious citizens expoſed to public view.

[i] Plut. in Pomp. Val. Max. l. v. c. 3. Liv. epit.

Sylla perpetual dictator. Year after the flood, 2922. Before Chriſt, 77. Of Rome 671.

CHAP. X.

The hiſtory of Rome, from the perpetual dictatorſhip of Sylla to the triumvirate of Cæſar, Pompey, and Craſſus.

SYLLA, now perpetual dictator, or, to ſpeak more properly, king and abſolute ſovereign of Rome, undertook the reformation of the government, being ſeconded therein by L. Valerius Flaccus, whom he appointed his general of the horſe. The firſt law he enacted related to the election of the chief magiſtrates, and imported, that no man ſhould ſtand for the prætorſhip till he had been quæſtor, nor be elected conſul till he had been prætor, which was only the revival of an antient cuſtom. Notwithſtanding this law, Lucretius Oſella, who had carried on the ſiege of Prænesſte, preſuming on that merit, appeared among the candidates for the conſulate, though he had not yet bore any office in the republic. Sylla put him in mind of the law he had juſt enacted; but the bold candidate, preſuming too much on his paſt ſervices and the favour of the people, continued to ſolicit their ſuffrages; which ſo provoked the dictator, who ſaw him from his tribunal, that he diſpatched a centurion with orders to cut off his head. This execution raiſed the indignation of the aſſembly; but Sylla made them thoroughly ſenſible, that they were no longer a free people, by a low, but expreſſive, fable; A ploughman, ſaid he, being tormented with vermin, pulled of his cloaths, and cleaned them. While he was buſy at his work, they began to moleſt him anew, and the ploughman killed a far greater number of thoſe troubleſome inſects the ſecond time, than he had done the firſt. They returned to diſturb him a third time; and then the poor labourer, out of all patience, threw his cloaths into the fire; and got rid of them all at once. This fable you may apply to yourſelves. Your ſeditions have hitherto coſt you but little blood. Take care that the caſe of the vermin be not one day your own [k]. This fable, coming from a man inveſted with an abſolute power, made the whole aſſembly tremble; the tumult was immediately appeaſed, and the election of the conſuls made agreeable to the dictator's will. The perſons choſen were M. Tullius Decula and Cn. Cornelius Dolabella, two of the chief officers of Sylla's army. They both ſet out for the provinces allotted them, the former for Gaul, and the latter for Macedon, leaving Sylla to reign alone in the capital, where he made ſeveral laws, which were all, except that relating to proſcriptions, allowed to be equitable and judicious. That law ordained, that thoſe, who eſcaped death after their proſcription, ſhould be killed where-ever they were found; that thoſe, who concealed them, ſhould be liable to the ſame puniſhment; that their effects ſhould be ſold to the beſt bidder; and that their children ſhould be incapable of holding any of the great employments of the republic. By another law he greatly weakened the authority of the tribunes of the people; for it enacted,

The dictator orders Oſella to be put to death.

Sylla makes ſeveral good laws.

[k] Appian. bell. civil. l. i.

ed, that for the future no tribune ſhould be allowed to ſpeak in the aſſembly of the people for or againſt any law in agitation; that only ſenators ſhould be choſen tribunes; and that thoſe who had bore this office ſhould be for ever excluded from the ſuperior offices. This made the ambitious diſdain ſeats in a college, beyond which they could not riſe. But the tribunes ſoon recovered their old power, and held it till the time of the emperors, who left them only the name and ſhadow of magiſtrates. The pontifices, augurs, and decemvirs appointed to keep and explain the Sibylline books, were by another law reinſtated in their former honours, and empowered to fill up the vacancies in their reſpective bodies; a prerogative as old as their inſtitution, but which had been transferred from them to the people, in the times that the plebeian faction prevailed. To each of theſe colleges he added five new members, ſo that they were no longer called decemvirs, but quindecemvirs, their number being encreaſed from ten to fifteen. The temple of Jupiter Capitolinus having been burnt two years before, and the Sibylline books, which were lodged there, deſtroyed in the flames, Sylla charged the quindecemvirs to repair that loſs, by ſearching for copies, or at leaſt fragments of them, in the cities of Erythræa, Samos, Ilium, &c. Out of this collection they formed a new book, which was indeed larger, but not ſo authentic, as the originals that had been kept at Rome, ever ſince the time of Tarquin the Proud [l] (U). Sylla had the mortification to

[l] Appian. ibid. Pomponius de orig. juriſ. Tacit. annal. l. xi. Cic. de legib. l. iii. Ulpian. digeſt.

(U) There is a great diſagreement among the antients as to the number of the Sibyls. Suidas ſays there were fourteen; Ælian reckons but four; Solinus only three; and Martianus Capella reduces them to two. But moſt authors follow Varro, who tells us in expreſs terms that they were ten. Some modern writers indeed, without any regard to the authority of Varro, or the other antients, are for uniting all the Sibyls in one. So that, according to them, different names were given to one and the ſame Sibyl, from the different places where ſhe uttered her oracles. She had, ſay they, no fixed abode, but being led by the ſpirit that inſpired her, ſhe firſt publiſhed her predictions in the city of Erythræa, the place of her nativity, then rambled about the world, and at length ended her rambles and her life at Cumæ in Italy. But be that as it will, it is certain that the Sibyls were held in great veneration ſee ſome of his laws abrogated before he died ; but the greateſt part of them continued in force, and are parts of the Roman law to this day.

AND

at Rome and among the eaſtern nations. A collection was made of the oracles they uttered. and copies of them multiplied in moſt cities of Greece, Italy, and Aſia. The pagans looked on theſe prophetic rhapſodies as a myſterious book containing the decrees of fate. They were the uſual reſource of people in times of calamity, and in important affairs, whereof the ſucceſs was doubtful. St. Jerom was of opinion, that God gave them this wonderful gift as a reward for their chaſtity ; others pretend, that the devil diſcovered future things to them ; and ſome aſcribe the enthuſiaſm, with which they were ſeized, to a melancholy diſpoſition. They were in all likelihood fanatical women, who gave themſelves the air of propheteſſes, in order to impoſe on the credulity of the ſimple. The pagan authors themſelves own the terms, in which their prophecies were couched, to have been very obſcure and ambiguous ; ſo that they were capable of the different interpretations which each perſon thought fit to give them. Cicero does not diſſemble, that the different rhapſodies of the Sibylline books were wrote and diſpoſed in ſuch a manner, as to be eaſily accommodated to all ſorts of events. Callide enim, qui illa compoſuit, ſays that writer (13), perfecit, ut, quodcunque accidiſſet, prædictum videretur. The ſame judgment ought to be made of the collection, which, by Sylla's orders, was ſubſtituted in the room of the old books after the burning of the capitol. The different fragments, out of which the quindecemvirs compoſed this volume, contained the dregs of ſuperſtition, and were, we may ſay, a jumble of all the dreams of paganiſm. Afterwards, ſome men, who pretended to inſpiration, enlarged this volume as they thought fit, which obliged the emperor Tiberius to put a ſtop to this enormous abuſe by a very ſevere decree. As to the eight books, which now bear the name of the Sibyls, critics agree that they are the work, at leaſt in part, of ſome chriſtian of the ſecond century. Some of the fathers, not aware of the impoſition, often quoted the books of the Sibyls in favour of the chriſtian religion ; and hence Celſus ſtiles the chriſtians Sibyliſts. But Origin and St. Auſtin did not ſuffer themſelves to be impoſed on, and therefore ſpeak of thoſe books with contempt. In the reign of the emperor Honorius, the famous Stilico, of whom we ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak in the ſequel of this hiſtory, cauſed thoſe fragments of the Sibylline books, which had been collected by Sylla's orders, to be all burnt, the greateſt part of the Roman ſenate having then embraced the chriſtian

(13) Cic. de divinat. l. ii.

And now Sylla, ruling in Rome without controul, under pretence of ſupplying the places of the many Roman citizens, who had periſhed in the civil wars, gave liberty and the right of Roman citizenſhip to ten thouſand ſlaves, whom from his own name he called Cornelians. Theſe were bound in gratitude to fight and vote for him on all occaſions. In the next place he rewarded his old legionaries, who had ſerved under him in the Levant and in Italy, beſtowing upon them the lands of the municipia and colonies, which had declared againſt him. Thus, ſurrounded by a guard of freed-men in Rome, and ſupported by his old legionaries in the country, he had nothing to fear, either from revolts in the city, or inſurrections among the allies. As all was quiet in the capital, Sylla thought this a proper time to decree himſelf a triumph for his conqueſts in Aſia, Greece, and Pontus. Rome had not for a long time ſeen one ſo magnificent. It laſted two days, on the firſt of which were carried before the triumphant victor fifteen thouſand pounds weight of gold and an hundred and fifteen thouſand pounds weight of ſilver, which he had brought from Greece and Aſia; and on the ſecond thirteen thouſand pounds weight of gold and ſeven thouſand pounds weight of ſilver, which young Marius had ſaved out of the fire of the capitol, and Sylla had recovered at Præneſte after his death. As ſoon as the proceſſion was over, Sylla's triumph.

chriſtian religion. However, Stilico was on this account ſeverely cenſured by the noble poet Rutilius in his itinerary (14). Dr. Hyde, ſhocked at the contradictions and fabulous adventures with which the pagans filled the hiſtory of the Sibyls, found out a new way of accounting for them. He obſerves in the conſtellation called the virgin a bright ſtar, which the Perſians called Sambula; and remarks, that the Perſians, who were fond of judiciary aſtrology, looked on the ſign of the Virgin, as having a greater power, than all the other celeſtial bodies, to diſcover future things. The Greeks, having learnt the ſciences of the eaſtern nations, ſoon adopted theſe trifling opinions, and, agreeable to their genius, embelliſhed them with their fictions. Their poets ſoon invented a Sibyl virgin in alluſion to the term Sambula; carried her into ſeveral countries; and made her act the part of a prop etefs (15). So that, according to this eminent writer, whatever has been ſaid both by the antients and moderns of the Sibyls, and their prophecies, is entirely fabulous.

(14) Vide Dempſter. ad Roſin. l. iii. c. 24. & Polyb. hiſtor. c. 8. (15) Vide Hyde de relig. Perſarum.

the conqueror, mounting the roſtra, according to cuſtom, gave the people a pompous detail of his exploits. As he aſcribed all his ſucceſſes to fortune, he ordered, that no other title ſhould be given him than that of the fortunate, a title in which he gloried, as much as other heroes had done in appellations taken from the countries which they had ſubdued [m] (W). His triumph was ſucceeded by the moſt pompous games that had ever been ſeen in Rome. We are told, that in the Olympic games, which were celebrated this year, only the races could be performed, the moſt ſkilful actors of Greece having left their own country, to diſplay their art in the capital of the world [n].

Pompey's ſucceſsful expedition in Africa.

In the mean time, the Marian faction began to revive in Africa. Cneius Domitius Ahenobarbus, nephew to the great Marius, had raiſed there twenty thouſand men, and prevailed on Hiarbas, one of the kings of Numidia, to join him. Hereupon Sylla ordered Pompey to leave Sicily, which he had ſettled in tranquillity, and paſs over with all poſſible expedition into Africa. Pompey, purſuant to his orders, immediately embarqued five legions, and, landing in the African province, marched without loſs of time againſt the enemy. When the two armies were in ſight of each other, and drawn up in battalia, a dreadful ſtorm aroſe; upon which Domitius, believing that Pompey would not attack him that day, ſounded a retreat. But, while his troops were retiring in ſome diſorder to their camp, the young general, laying hold of that opportunity, fell upon them, and after an obſtinate diſpute, which laſted the greater part of the day, gained a complete victory. Of twenty thouſand men Domitius left ſeventeen dead upon the ſpot, and not without much difficulty regained his camp with the poor remains of his ſhattered army. Thither Pompey purſued him, forced his camp, killed Domitius, and took Hiarbas priſoner. In conſequence of this ſucceſs, he recovered all the cities of Africa, which had been drawn off from [m] Appian. ibid. [n] Plut. & Appian. ibid.

(W) Plutarch tells us, that his wife having brought him twins, he named the male Fauſtus, and the female Fauſta, which words ſignify fortunate or lucky. However, in his letters to the Greeks, he ſtyled himſelf Epaphroditus, that is, The Beloved of Venus; and his trophies, which were ſtill extant in Plutarch's time, bore this inſcription, Lucius Cornelius Sylla Epaphroditus (16).

(16) Plut. in Sylla.

from Sylla's party, entered Numidia, and having reduced that part of it, which belonged to Hiarbas his priſoner, gave it to Hiempſal, who had always oppoſed the Marian faction. As this glorious expedition was completed in forty days, ſo rapid a progreſs by a general of twenty-four years of age alarmed the dictator himſelf, who ordered the young hero to diſband his troops and return to Rome. Both Pompey and his troops were ſenſibly affected with this order, which would have produced another civil war, had not Pompey conducted himſelf with great temper. For when his legionaries began to mutiny, he reſolutely proteſted, that he would rather die by his own hand, than involve Rome in new troubles. Having thus appeaſed his troops and diſbanded three of his legions, he returned to Rome, where he was received with uncommon marks of friendſhip by the dictator, who went out to meet him, embraced him with great tenderneſs, and honoured him with the ſurname of The Great, ordering all, who were preſent, to give him that glorious title °.

Sylla jealous of Pompey.

When the time came for electing new conſuls, Sylla, though dictator, ſtood for that office, and accordingly was elected with Q. Cæcilius Metellus, ſurnamed Pius, who had joined him upon his firſt landing in Italy. Never was any conſular year more peaceable. All men trembled at the very name of Sylla, and the Romans, once ſo fond of liberty, were at length brought to ſubmit tamely to the yoke of an imperious maſter. However, the dictator, to gain the affections of the multitude, gave them ſuch entertainments as now ſeem to ſurpaſs all credit. He conſecrated the tenths of his whole ſubſtance to Hercules, and on that occaſion made a general feaſt for all the people of Rome; where there was ſuch an abundance, or rather profuſion, of all the delicacies the ſea, rivers, foreſts, or fields could afford, that immenſe quantities of proviſions were every day (for the feaſt laſted ſeveral days) thrown into the Tiber. Plutarch tells us, that the wine, with which he regaled the people, was forty years old and upwards. But the joy of this magnificent entertainment was ſomewhat abated by the death of his wife Metella, whom he had always reſpected, notwithſtanding her irregularities. However, the dictator's grief did not laſt long. A few months after, he entertained the people with a ſhow of gladiators; and, as in thoſe days men and women ſat promiſcuouſly Feaſts the whole Roman people.

° Plut. in Pomp.

miſcuouſly together, a young lady, of extraordinary beauty and of the firſt quality, placed herſelf near Sylla. She was the daughter of Meſſala, and ſiſter to the famous orator Hortenſius; her name was Valeria, and ſhe had been a few days before divorced from her huſband. As ſhe was gay and lively, though virtuous and of an unblemiſhed reputation, ſhe came behind Sylla, and reſting her hand gently upon his ſhoulder, took a little of the nap from off his robe, and then returned to her ſeat. The dictator turned ſuddenly about, and ſeemed to be much ſurpriſed with the familiarity, when Valeria addreſſed him thus: It is not out of any want of reſpect that I have done this; but becauſe I was deſirous to partake of your good fortune (X). Sylla, greatly pleaſed with this anſwer and taken with the charms of Valeria, ſent privately to enquire who ſhe was, and to learn her name, family, circumſtances, and character. From that time they did nothing but ogle each other in all public places, receive and return amorous glances and wanton ſmiles. In ſhort, the old warrior, captivated with a few affected glances and coquetiſh airs, like an amorous youth, without experience or diſcretion, was continually dangling after the beautiful Valeria, till at length he gave way to his paſſion, and married her [P].

Falls in love with Valeria.

And marries her.

In the mean time, Pompey was ſoliciting the ſenate and people for a triumph, which his late victories ſeemed indeed well to deſerve, and the ſenate was willing to grant. But Sylla, probably jealous of the glory of the young hero, oppoſed his pretenſions, alledging a law, which enacted that none but prætors and conſuls ſhould triumph, and that for battles gained under their own auſpices; whereas Pompey was but a private Roman knight, and had gained his victories under the auſpices of the dictator. But this did not diſcourage the young conqueror, who continued to make intereſt with the ſenate and people for the gaining of his point. Sylla told him plainly, that he would employ all his credit with the people againſt him; not doubting, but that declaration, as he was maſter of the ſuffrages of the people, would make him deſpair of obtaining the honour he ſo ardently deſired. But Pompey, not in the leaſt diſcouraged, anſwered the dictator frankly, that his Pompey's bold anſwer to Sylla.

[P] Plut. ibid.

(X) This paſſage is very remarkable; for it ſhews us, that the ſuperſtition is of a very antient date, by which men were perſuaded, that commerce with, or touch of, a lucky perſon, was a means of making them partakers of his good fortune.

his oppoſition mattered not, ſince more people adored the riſing than the ſetting ſun. Theſe words the dictator did not well underſtand; but obſerving no ſmall ſurprize in the coutenances of thoſe who ſtood by, he aſked what the young man had ſaid. When it was told him, he wondered at his boldneſs, and then cried out twice, Let him then triumph in the name of the gods. Pompey, taking advantage of this anſwer, immediately ordered every thing to be got ready for his triumph; and to give more uneaſineſs to thoſe who envied him, he ordered his triumphal chariot to be drawn by four elephants; for he had taken ſeveral of thoſe warlike animals from the princes he had ſubdued in Africa. But the gate of the city being too narrow for four elephants to paſs abreaſt under it, he was forced to be ſatisfied with horſes as uſual. Thus a Roman knight was diſtinguiſhed with the higheſt military honours, before he had attained to the age requiſite for having a ſeat in the ſenate. But the evil fate of Rome was raiſing up againſt him a formidable rival in the perſon of Julius Cæſar, who in this very year made his firſt campaign in the eaſt. He had married, as we have obſerved above, the daughter of Cornelius Cinna, and obtained at the age of ſeventeen, if we may believe Suetonius [q], the office of high-prieſt of Jupiter, being ſupported by the Marian faction, which then prevailed. Plutarch indeed contradicts Suetonius, and tells us, that when Sylla gave law in Rome, Cæſar ſtood for the prieſthood of Jupiter, but was excluded from that dignity by the dictator. Not long after Sylla endeavoured to prevail upon him to divorce his wife Cornelia, who had already brought him his firſt daughter Julia. But the bold youth had courage enough to reſiſt this formidable maſter of Rome to his face, though he had juſt before forced Piſo to put away his wife Annia, whom he tenderly loved, and obliged Pompey to part with his wife Antiſtia, and marry Æmilia, daughter-in-law to Sylla by his wife Metella, who had been married to Æmilius Scaurus. The dictator, highly provoked againſt Cæſar for daring to contradict his ſovereign will, reſolved to proſcribe him; and it was not without infinite difficulties that the friends of the Julian family got the decree of proſcription ſuſpended. When they entreated him to excuſe the ſallies of a warm and preſumptuous youth, from whom he could have nothing to fear, Sylla anſwered, that he diſcovered in him, young as he Pompey triumphs.

Julius Cæſar reſiſts Sylla.

[q] Suet. in Julio.

He leaves Rome, and retires into Bithynia.

he was, ſeveral Mariuſes. When Cæſar heard this, he ſtole out of Rome, and wandered ſome time in the country of the Sabines, where he had the misfortune to be one day ſurprized by a party of Sylla's ſoldiers. But Cornelius, who commanded them, conſented to let him eſcape upon his paying two talents. And now thinking himſelf no longer ſafe in Italy, he withdrew to the court of Nicomedes king of Bithynia, where his reſidence is ſaid to have proved fatal to his modeſty, the private hours he ſpent with that prince raiſing ſuſpicions no-ways to his honour [r]. In this account we have followed Plutarch; for Suetonius ſays nothing of Cæſar's flight; but on the contrary affirms, that Sylla granted him his pardon at the requeſt of the veſtals, of M. Æmilius, and Aurelius Cotta [s]. After he had reſided ſome time at the court of the Bithynian king, he went to ſerve under Marcus Minucius Thermus, at that time prætor of Aſia. Suetonius ſays, that this general ſent him into Bithynia, and gave him the command of the fleet, which Nicomedes fitted out to aſſiſt at the ſiege of Mitylene, the only city in Aſia, which refuſed to ſubmit to the Romans, after the treaty of peace concluded between Mithridates and Sylla. Cæſar diſtinguiſhed himſelf at the taking of this city, and merited ſeveral civic crowns, which were given to thoſe who had ſaved the life of a Roman citizen [t].

His firſt campaign.

Cicero pleads in public.

But to return to Sylla; he reduced this year Nola in Campania and Volaterræ in Hetruria, the only two cities that held out againſt him. And now all Italy being in perfect tranquillity, he declined the conſulate for the next year, and recommended to the tribes P. Servilius Vatia, a man of merit and his old friend, and Appius Claudius Pulcher, who were accordingly choſen in the field of Mars. This year Cicero firſt pleaded in public in favour of Roſcius, whoſe father had been proſcribed and killed by Sylla's orders. As he was not very cautious in his reflections on a government which made Rome tremble, he thought it adviſeable to leave his country, after he had given a public proof of his great genius. He retired to Athens, where he perfected his talents for oratory, and improved his taſte for philoſophy.

And now Sylla after having deſtroyed above an hundred thouſand Roman citizens, taken away the lives of ninety ſenators, proſcribed or cauſed to be murdered near two thouſand

[r] Plut. in Cæſar. [s] Suet. ibid. [t] Suet. in Julio.

thouſand ſix hundred knights, and buried numberleſs multitudes of the allies in the ruins of their cities, reſolved to lay down the power he had uſurped, and put himſelf upon a level with the reſt of the people. Had he conſulted ambition or policy, he would never have taken ſuch a reſolution. The Roman people had ſet no limits to his power in point of time. There were no domeſtic troubles to create him any uneaſineſs, Rome being now accuſtomed to bear the yoke. His friends, who were as much intereſted as himſelf in his preſervation, were a ſufficient ſecurity to him againſt the attempts of his enemies. On the other hand, ſo many dangers ſurrounded him in a private life, that he could not reaſonably expect to be ſafe. But none of theſe conſiderations had weight with him; he reſolved to lay down his power, and reſtore the republic to her antient liberty, which muſt have proceeded from a greatneſs of mind, to which none of the antient hiſtorians have done juſtice. When he had taken this final reſolution, he aſſembled the people, mounted the roſtra, and ſurpriſed Rome with ſo unexpected a determination. He repreſented in a ſhort ſpeech the miſerable condition in which he had found the city at his return from Aſia; and added, that, the republic being in great danger, he had been forced to uſe violent remedies; that the loſs of a little blood would only have encreaſed the diſtemper inſtead of curing it; that he had therefore thought it neceſſary to take a great deal of blood from a body ſo robuſt and diſeaſed, in order to reſtore it to perfect health, &c. He concluded his ſpeech with theſe words, which filled the heart of every true Roman with joy: And now, Romans, I leave you to yourſelves, I reſign my office, deveſt myſelf of the unlimited power you have conferred upon me, and am ready to give an account of my whole adminiſtration, and anſwer in a private capacity, all the accuſations that ſhall be brought againſt me. This ſaid, he diſmiſſed his lictors, came down from the roſtra, and walked a great while in the forum, diſcourſing familiarly with ſome of his friends before the multitude, who, ſtruck with admiration, looked upon ſo unexpected a change as a prodigy. Though the city was then full of the children and friends of proſcribed perſons, yet none offered to inſult him, except one young man, who followed him to his houſe, abuſing him in a moſt ſcurrilous manner. Sylla did not deign to give him any anſwer; but turning to the few friends he had about him, This uſage, ſaid he, will Sylla abdicates the dictatorſhip.

for

for the future deter any man from laying down the ſovereign power, as I have done, if once he gets it into his hands. A few days after he retired to his fine country houſe near Cumæ, ſpent there ſome days in more tranquillity than he could have done at Rome, and then returned to the city, leſt his enemies ſhould think that fear had confined him to the country. In Rome he maintained the rank of a man of the firſt diſtinction, but intermeddled no farther in public affairs, than became a private perſon, whoſe great employments and powerful friends gave him more weight than a common citizen. At the very firſt election after his reſignation, he had the mortification to ſee Pompey, his pupil, or rather his creature, aſſume an aſcendant over him in the aſſembly of the people. Pompey uſed all his intereſt to get his friend M. Æmilius Lepidus firſt nominated conſul; Sylla on the other hand ſolicited for Q. Lutatius Catulus. The former was a man of a violent temper, and a declared enemy to Sylla; whereas the latter was his intimate friend, and generally looked upon as a perſon of great probity, wiſdom, and experience.

Pompey reſiſts Sylla at the election of conſuls.

The emulation was greater between the chiefs of the two parties, than between the candidates themſelves: but Pompey, who was extremely favoured by the people, prevailed. His friend Lepidus was firſt nominated conſul, not by any merit or intereſt of his own, but by the power and ſollicitation of Pompey (Y). When Pompey was coming out of the aſſembly, overjoyed with his ſucceſs, Sylla took him aſide, and told him, that he had got the worſt of men named conſul before the moſt virtuous man in Rome; but that he had no reaſon to triumph in his victory, becauſe he would find, when it was too late, that he had been nouriſhing a ſnake in his boſom. What Sylla foretold proved too true, as we ſhall ſee in a more proper place. In the mean time, the two conſuls entered upon their office, and the miſunderſtanding, which aroſe

(Y) There was no primacy or diſtinction between the two conſuls. They were both equal in dignity and authority. But it was an honour to be named firſt; for the people gave ſtronger evidences of their zeal and affection for him, than they did for the other, who was named in the ſecond place. The advantage of the conſul firſt named was ſo inconſiderable, that he could not ſo much as aſſume the faſces firſt, unleſs he was older than his colleague, or had a greater number of children, or was entering upon his ſecond conſulate.

aroſe between them, threatening the city with a new ſtorm, Sylla withdrew again to his country-houſe, and there gave himſelf up to the moſt infamous debaucheries, though full ſixty years of age. The charms of his wife Valeria could not keep him from a ſcandalous commerce with actors and actreſſes. His chief favourites were Roſcius the comedian, Sorex the chief mimic, and Metrobius, who acted womens parts on the ſtage. With theſe he ſpent whole days and nights in drinking and revelling, which brought a diſtemper upon him, that ſoon put an end to his life. His blood was corrupted, and bred an impoſthume in his bowels. This he was not aware of till the corruption infected his fleſh, and his whole body ſwarmed with vermin. Many ſlaves were employed night and day in deſtroying them, but they multiplied ſo faſt, that his cloaths, baths, rooms, and his very food, was covered with them. He went often every day into the waters to cleanſe his body; but being at laſt ſenſible, that his diſtemper was paſt curing, he applied himſelf to the finiſhing of his memoirs; in the twenty-ſecond book of which he declared, that the Chaldeans had foretold him, that, after he had acquired great power and glory, he ſhould conclude the laſt act of his life in full proſperity. Ten days before his death he interpoſed in ſome diſputes, which the inhabitants of Puteoli had among themſelves, reconciled the contending parties, and preſcribed them a form of government, which they adopted. The day before he died he was informed, that Granius, the chief magiſtrate of Puteoli, delayed paying the immenſe ſums due from him to the public, in hopes of being freed from that obligation by Sylla's death. Hereupon Sylla ſent for him into his bed-chamber, and there ordered his ſlaves to ſtrangle him in his preſence; but ſtraining his voice in the heat of his paſſion, he broke the impoſthume, and voided a great deal of blood. This diſcharge weakened him to ſuch a degree, that he paſſed the night in great agony, and died the day following, leaving behind him two children very young by his wife Metella. Valeria was afterwards delivered of a daughter named Poſthuma, for ſo the Romans called thoſe who were born after the death of their fathers[s]. He was, without all doubt, one of the greateſt commanders Rome ever bred, and as able a ſtateſman. But moſt of the antients ſeem to have drawn a veil over all his good qualities, and to have diſplayed only his cruelties cruelties and proſcriptions, which, we own, betrayed a moſt cruel and inhuman temper. But after all, we ought not to forget that greatneſs of mind truly heroic, which appeared in his unexpected and ſurpriſing abdication. What could a man of the moſt refined virtue have done more, than reſtore his country to its antient liberty, reform the republic with excellent laws, revive and enforce the old inſtitutions, and lay down his power as ſoon as it was no longer neceſſary for the public good? Could the warmeſt patriot have ſhewn a more generous regard for his country? His funeral occaſioned a miſunderſtanding between the conſuls. Lepidus was for having him carried to the burial-place of his anceſtors, without any mark of diſtinction. But Catulus made uſe of all the authority his office gave him, and Pompey of his intereſt with the people, to have the funeral honours paid to the deceaſed, which were due to his merit. And indeed never was a more magnificent funeral ſeen in Rome. His corſe, being placed on a rich bier, was carried on the ſhoulders of four ſenators, and attended by the pontifices, the veſtals, the ſenate in a body, all the curule magiſtrates, the whole body of Roman knights, and a numerous train of officers, who had ſerved under him in Africa, Greece, Aſia, and Italy. The veſtals and pontifices ſung hymns in praiſe of the deceaſed, which were repeated by the ſenate, the knights, and the whole multitude. The body was burnt with great ſolemnity in the field of Mars, where no funeral pile had been raiſed ever ſince the time of the firſt kings. Many ſtatues were erected to his memory, and a moſt magnificent monument in the field of Mars, with an epitaph of his own compoſing, the ſubſtance of which was, that no friend had ever done him ſo much good, nor enemy ſo much hurt, but he had returned both with uſury [t]. Of all his friends, who were almoſt numberleſs, Pompey alone, whoſe ingratitude gave him no ſmall offence, was left out of his will.

Sylla's debauched life in the country.

Sylla dies. Year after the Flood, 2926. Before Chriſt, 73. Of Rome 675.

[s] Plut. in Sylla. Liv. epit. l. clx. c. 4. Appian. bell. civil. l. 1.

His funeral.

And epitaph.

SYLLA was no ſooner dead, than new diſturbances ſprung up in the republic. M. Æmilius Lepidus the conſul did all that lay in his power to revive the old quarrels between the nobility and the people, hoping by that means to make himſelf as abſolute maſter of the government as Sylla had been. He began with attempting to annul Sylla's acts, which would have deprived the republic of the many wiſe laws the dictator had made. But he was therein reſolutely oppoſed

New diſturbances raiſed by Lepidus.

[t] Plut. & Appian. ibid.

oppoſed by his collegue Catulus; and the miſunderſtanding between the two chief magiſtrates was carried ſo far, that the ſenate, dreading the conſequences of their quarrel, forced them to ſwear, that they would not take up arms againſt each other. Care was alſo taken to ſeparate the two rivals, and to make the turbulent Lepidus ſet out without delay for Tranſalpine Gaul, which had fallen to him by lot. The incendiary indeed left Rome, at the head of a conſular army; but, inſtead of paſſing the Alps, continued in Hetruria, till his conſulate was near expiring. He then drew near Rome with his army, which he had taken care to ſtrengthen with new levies in Hetruria, and openly declared, that his deſign was to procure himſelf a ſecond conſulate by force, if he could not obtain it otherwiſe. He expected to have entered Rome without oppoſition; but to his great ſurpriſe he found both his collegue and Pompey under arms, the one poſted at the entrance of the bridge Milvius, the other at the foot of the Janiculus. As he was too far advanced to go back, he attempted to force his way into the city; but was repulſed by Catulus and Pompey, and obliged to ſave himſelf by a ſhameful flight into Hetruria. The capital being delivered from all danger by the defeat of the ſeditious conſul, Pompey was ordered to march againſt M. Junius Brutus, the father of the famous Brutus, who had declared for Lepidus, and commanded a great detachment in Ciſalpine Gaul. Brutus, at the approach of Pompey, ſhut himſelf up in Mutina, where he was cloſely beſieged, and at length forced to ſurrender up himſelf and his whole army at diſcretion. Pompey treated his troops with great humanity, but ordered Brutus himſelf to be beheaded, without regarding the hatred which ſo odious an execution might bring upon him [u].

Lepidus defeated by Catulus and Pompey.

In the mean time, Lepidus, having aſſembled his diſperſed forces, and made new levies in Hetruria and in the countries of the allies, appeared once more before Rome. But, finding Catulus ready to receive him, and being at the ſame time informed of the defeat of Brutus and reduction of Mutina, he retired a ſecond time into Hetruria. Upon his retreat, the great elections were made with the uſual tranquillity, when D. Junius Brutus, ſurnamed Lepidus, and Mamercus Æmilius Livianus were choſen conſuls. And now Lepidus, having loſt all hopes of obtaining the [u] Plut. in Pomp. Appian. bell. civil. ibid.

the conſulate, left Italy and went over to Sardinia, where he raiſed a new army with a deſign to carry the war into Sicily. But he was prevented by death from purſuing the wicked meaſures he had taken. He is ſaid to have died of grief upon the receipt of a letter, aſſuring him, that his wife, in his abſence, had proved unfaithful to him. His party fell with him; and Catulus and Pompey ſhared between them the glory of having ſaved Rome from the new misfortunes that threatened her [w].

Lepidus dies in Sardinia.

During theſe tranſactions at home, Muræna, whom Sylla had left in Aſia, unjuſtly attacked the king of Pontus, and forced him into the ſecond Mithridatic war, of which we have given a very particular account in our hiſtory of Pontus.

Sertorius retires to Spain.

Italy now enjoyed a profound tranquillity; but the party of Marius and Cinna was ſtill kept up in Spain by the brave Sertorius, whoſe noble exploits, ſince his proſcription and flight, we have, to avoid confuſion, reſerved for this place. Upon the firſt advantages gained by Sylla in Italy, Sertorius, who had been appointed by the Marian faction prætor of Spain, retired thither, to ſecure that country, which would be a refuge to his friends, and a ſupport to his declining party. Notwithſtanding the oppoſition he met with from the Barbarians, through whoſe countries he paſſed, he got ſafe to his government; and there, by his affable and obliging behaviour, ſo gained the affections both of the nobility and people, that all Spain declared for the new prætor. Thus that flouriſhing country was unfortunately brought to take part in the diviſions of the republic, and by that means became the ſeat of the civil war, which ambition had begun at Rome. Sylla no ſooner heard of the arrival of Sertorius in Spain, than he ſent Caius Annius at the head of a powerful army to drive him from thence. Sertorius, having timely notice of the dictator's deſign, immediately detached Julius Salinator with a body of ſix thouſand men to guard the narrow paſſes of the Pyrenees; which he did ſo effectually, that Annius, upon his arrival finding it impoſſible to open himſelf a way into Spain, encamped at the foot of the mountains, in great perplexity, not knowing what courſe to take. But, in the mean time, one Calpurnius Lanarius, being gained over by Annius, treacherouſly murdered Julius Salinator, which ſo terrified the troops under his command, that they abandoned the paſſes, [w] Plut. & Appian. ibid.

paſſes, and gave Annius an opportunity of penetrating into the heart of Spain. Sertorius not being ſtrong enough to keep the field, retired with three thouſand men to New Carthage, and there embarquing on board a fleet haſtily got together, paſſed over into Africa, and landed on the coaſt of Mauritania. His men went aſhore to ſupply themſelves with freſh water; but, while they were ſtraggling about with too much ſecurity, the Barbarians fell upon them, and put many of them to the ſword. This new misfortune forced Sertorius to ſail back to Spain; but finding the whole coaſt lined with Annius's men, he put out to ſea again, not knowing what courſe to ſteer. At ſome diſtance from the coaſt he fell in with a ſmall fleet of Cilician pirates, who were cruiſing between Africa and Spain, and having prevailed on them to join him in hopes of booty, he ſailed for the iſland of Pityuſa, now Yvica, on the coaſt of Africa, where he made a deſcent, overpowered the garriſon placed there by Annius, and got a conſiderable booty. This ſlight advantage brought Annius in perſon upon him, with a great fleet, having five thouſand ſoldiers on board. Though Sertorius's fleet conſiſted of veſſels not built for ſtrength, but for lightneſs, he made ready to engage the enemy. But a violent ſtorm ariſing, moſt of his ſhips were driven againſt the rocky ſhore, and daſhed to pieces. Sertorius himſelf, with the ſmall remains of his ſhattered fleet, being prevented by the fury of the weather from putting out to ſea, and by the enemy from landing, was toſſed about for ten days together, being all that time, as the ſea ran very high, in great danger of periſhing with all his men. As ſoon as the ſtorm was over, he paſſed the ſtreights of Gades, and landed near the mouth of the Bætis. There he met with ſome ſea-men newly arrived from the Atlantic or Fortunate iſlands (Z), and was ſo taken with the account they gave him of thoſe happy regions, that, being quite

Is driven from thence by Annius.

Is joined by a fleet of Cilician pirates.

(Z) Theſe iſlands, according to Plutarch, were only two in number, divided from each other by a narrow channel, and diſtant about ten thouſand furlongs from the coaſt of Africa. The deſcription he gives us of them agrees exactly with that which we read in the fourth book of the Odyſſey. But after all, we are ſtill at a loſs to know what country the antients meant by the Atlantic or Fortunate iſlands. Plato deſcribes them in a very pompous manner in his Timæus and Critias; and the great extent he allows them, has inclined ſome, namely Ortelius and Sanſon, to believe, that quite tired out with ſo many fatigues and dangers both by ſea and land, he reſolved to retire thither, and ſpend his life in peace and quietneſs, far from the noiſe of wars, and free from the troubles of government. He no ſooner communicated his deſign to the Cilician pirates, than they abandoned him; and, chuſing rather to rove about the ſeas in queſt of ſpoils and riches, than to live in peace and quiet, ſet ſail for Africa, to aſſiſt Aſcalis king of Mauritania againſt his rebellious ſubjects. Sertorius, who only entertained a faint deſire of a quiet and retired life, no ſooner heard of this new war in Africa, than he likewiſe reſolved to ſet ſail thither and join the enemies of Aſcalis. He loſt no time, but immediately put to ſea, and landing on the coaſt of Mauritania, marched directly againſt Aſcalis, defeated him in that he meant America. But no one, before Mr. Ruſbeck, ever dreamt, that Plato in deſcribing his Atlantis had Scandinavia in view, which comprehends the kingdoms of Norway and Sweden. That learned writer, in love with the colds and froſts of his native country, finds all the charms of this renowned iſland in thoſe northern and frozen countries. To convince others of this, he urges no fewer than an hundred and two arguments in his work intitled Atlantica, and finds in certain ruins not far from Upſal the ſame ſituation and dimenſions which Plato gives to the capital of Atlantis. Norway and Sweden are, we allow, moſt pleaſant and delightful countries; but we can hardly perſuade ourſelves, that Homer had either of them in view when he deſcribed the Elyſian fields, which he places in the iſland of Atlantis. His deſcription of that happy region is as follows:

Paſſes over into Africa.

Elyſium ſhall be thine; the bliſsful plains
Of utmoſt earth, where Rhadamanthus reigns.
Joys ever young, unmix'd with pain or fear,
Fill the wide circle of th' eternal year.
Stern winter ſmiles on that auſpicious clime,
The fields are florid with unfading prime.
From the bleak pole no winds inclement blow,
Mould the round hail, or flake the fleecy ſnow;
But from the breezy deep the bleſt inhale
The flagrant murmurs of the weſtern gale.

We can hardly believe, that ſtern winter ſmiles either upon Norway or Sweden, that the fields there are florid with unfading prime, that no inclement winds blow from the bleak pole, &c. and therefore are inclined to think, that father Kircher gueſſed better than Mr. Ruſbeck, when he took the Canaries and Aſores for the Fortunate or Atlantic iſlands.

in a pitched battle, and obliged him to take refuge in the city of Tingis, now Tangier, which he cloſely beſieged. In the mean time, Pacianus, whom Sylla had ſent to aſſiſt the king, advanced againſt Sertorius at the head of a conſiderable army. Hereupon the brave general, leaving part of his forces before the place, marched with the reſt to meet Pacianus, whoſe forces, though far ſuperior to his own in number, he entirely defeated, ſlew the general himſelf, and took the whole army priſoners. After this victory he not only reduced the city of Tingis, but made himſelf abſolute maſter of the whole country. Having thus delivered the oppreſſed Mauritanians from the tyrannical yoke of Aſcalis, he reſtored to them their eſtates, their cities, their laws, and their privileges, accepting only of ſuch acknowledgments as the people freely offered him [x].

Defeats Pacianus, and takes the city of Tingis.

HOWEVER, his reputation flew croſs the ſea. The Luſitanians, being threatened with a new war from Annius, ſent an embaſſy to him, inviting him to come and take upon him the command of their armies. This was raiſing him to the height of his deſires; he therefore immediately embarqued with two thouſand five hundred Romans, who had followed him in his flight, and ſeven hundred Africans, who were willing to ſhare his fortune with him; and putting to ſea ſteered his courſe to Luſitania. In his paſſage he happened to fall in with the Roman fleet, commanded by Cotta; but having forced his way through it, he arrived ſafe on the Luſitanian coaſt, landed his men, and marched ſtrait to mount Ballera, the place of the general rendezvouz. There he put himſelf at the head of that warlike nation, and became, in a manner, king of Luſitania, the natives, who were well acquainted with his virtues, experience in war, and great abilities, inveſting him with an abſolute and uncontrouled authority, and committing to his care themſelves and their fortunes. And indeed no man was more worthy to govern a ſtate, or command an army. He was, according to Plutarch, free from all vices, and an enemy to all ſorts of pleaſures; in adverſity and dangers undaunted, and no ways puffed up with proſperity, but of an even mind, ever courteous and ever obliging. He was ſparing and backward in puniſhing, but in rewarding liberal and magnificent, even to prodigality. As to war, none of the moſt famous and renowned generals of antiquity underſtood that art better than Sertorius. He did not confine himſelf to one uniform method in ranging his cohorts and diſpoſing his ſquadrons, but varied it according to the character of his enemy. Tho' he approved of the order of battle eſtabliſhed among the Romans, yet he would not ſervilely adhere to it on all occaſions, but changed it when he thought proper, and by that means often broke the meaſures of the generals who oppoſed him. His maſter-piece was the art of haraſſing the enemy, laying ambuſcades, ſurpriſing them in narrow paſſes, tiring them with long marches, and avoiding a general engagement unleſs he was ſure of victory. With theſe qualifications, Sertorius, at the head of eight thouſand men, made war with four Roman generals, who had under their command an hundred and twenty thouſand foot, ſix thouſand horſe, and two thouſand archers and ſlingers. Titus Didius, governor of Bætica, was the firſt champion who entered the liſts with him, and gave him battle among the mountains. But that weak general was defeated with the loſs of two thouſand men, and driven out of the field. Hereupon Sylla diſpatched Metellus, one of the beſt generals then in Rome, to ſtop the progreſs of this new enemy. But the reputation of that great commander ſuffered much by this expedition. For he did not know which way to turn himſelf, having to do with a man of undaunted boldneſs and uncommon ſagacity, who was continually moleſting him, and yet could not be brought to a pitched battle; but, by the ſwiftneſs and dexterity of his Spaniſh ſoldiery, was continually changing his ſtation, caſting his army into all forms, and every day contriving new ſtratagems. Metellus on his firſt arrival ſent for L. Domitius, then prætor of Hither Spain to his aſſiſtance. But Sertorius, informed of the march of Domitius, detached Hirtuleius or Herculeius, his quæſtor, againſt him, who gave the Roman prætor a total overthrow. Hereupon Metellus ordered Lucius Lollius, prætor of Narbonne Gaul, to leave his province and join him. But Hirtuleius, meeting him in the neighbourhood of Ilerda, now Lerida, gained a complete victory over him, diſperſed his troops, and killed his lieutenant-general. Upon the fame of theſe victories, all thoſe, who were diſſatisfied with the government of Sylla, eſpecially ſuch of the proſcribed perſons as could eſcape his fury, flocked to Sertorius from all parts. Inſomuch, that he ſoon ſaw in his camp ſuch a number of illuſtrious Roman citizens, that he formed a ſenate of them, whoſe authority he ſet up in competition with that of the ſenate of Rome.

Is made general of the Luſitanians.

His character.

[x] Plut. in Sertor.

Defeats T. Didius.

Gains great advantages over the Romans.

Out

Out of them he likewiſe choſe his quæſtors, his military tribunes, and other officers of his army. Thus he erected Luſitania into a new republic, which, as it conſiſted chiefly of Romans, rivalled that of Rome. Sylla, highly provoked to ſee a proſcribed perſon thus reigning in Spain, and the republic robbed of one of the fineſt parts of her dominions, was continually ſending freſh ſupplies to Metellus; but Sertorius, at the head of an handful of men, who were accuſtomed to range about the mountains, to endure hunger and thirſt, and to live expoſed to the wind and weather without fire or covering, ſo harraſſed the Roman army, that Metellus himſelf began to be quite diſheartened. If he ſent out his men in parties to forage, Sertorius, who was well acquainted with the country, ſcarce ever failed of cutting off their retreat; if the whole army marched in a body, he was continually harraſſing and alarming them, falling on their rear, blocking up the narrow paſſes, intercepting their convoys, cutting off their ſtragglers, &c. if they laid ſiege to any town, he preſently appeared, beſieged them, and reduced them to great ſtreights for want of proviſions. By this means Metellus ſuffered the ſame inconveniencies as if he had been conquered, while Sertorius reaped all the advantages of a conqueror. The latter being informed, that his rival had ſpoke of him with contempt, as if he declined fighting out of cowardice, immediately ſent him a challenge, inviting him to put an end to the war by a ſingle combat. But Metellus, who was advanced in years, wiſely refuſed to enter the liſts with a ſtrong active man, then in the flower of his age, thinking that it became a general, as Theophraſtus obſerves, to die like a general, and not like a gladiator. However, his declining the challenge brought him into diſcredit with the undiſcerning multitude; and he, to recover his reputation by ſome ſignal action, turned his arms againſt Lacobriga (A), a conſiderable city of the Turduli, which he hoped to take in two days time, there being but one well within the city. But Sertorius found means to convey into the city, before Metellus inveſted it, ſix thouſand ſkins full of water, and to remove all thoſe who could be of no ſervice during the ſiege; ſo that Metellus continued a long time before the place, without gaining the leaſt advantage over the enemy. When he had ſpent moſt part of his proviſions, he ſent out Aquinus, at the Forms Luſitania into a republic.

Haraſſes Metellus's troops.

(A) The antient Lacobriga is thought to have ſtood where Lagos, a little city of Spain near the bay of Cadiz, now ſtands.

the head of six thousand men, to bring in fresh supplies from the neighbouring country. But the brave Sertorius falling unexpectedly on Aquinus, cut in pieces part of his detachment, and took the rest prisoners, the commander himself being the only man, who had the good luck to make his escape. And now Metellus, being reduced to great straights for want of provisions, shamefully raised the siege, and withdrew from before the place amidst the hisses of the Spaniards, who insulted him from their ramparts[y].

Defeats Aquinus, and obliges Metellus to raise the siege of Lacobriga.

Sertorius having gained the esteem, love, and admiration of the Lusitanians by these repeated advantages, and much more by his obliging and insinuating behaviour, changed their savage and furious manner of fighting, brought them to make use of the Roman arms, taught them to keep their ranks and follow their ensigns, and, in short, out of a confused multitude of thieves and robbers, formed a regular well-disciplined army. He likewise bestowed liberally upon them gold and silver to adorn their arms, caused their shields to be wrought and engraved with various figures, and, by conversing familiarly with them, prevailed upon them to lay aside their own dress, and assume the Roman toga or gown. But what delighted them most was, the care he took of their children. For he sent for all the children of the noblemen in those parts, placed them in the great city of Osca (B), and there appointed masters to instruct them in the Greek and Roman learning, that they might in due time, as he gave out, be capable of sharing with him the government of the republic. Under this pretence he really made them hostages for the fidelity of their parents (C), who nevertheless were wonderfully pleased to see their children going daily to school in good order, and handsomely dressed in fine long garments edged with purple. Sertorius paid large salaries for their learning, often enquired what progress they had made, examined them himself, and rewarded the most deserving with those Bullæ Aureæ Gains the affections of the Lusitanians.

[y] Plut. ibid.

(B) The city of Osca, now Huesca, stood in the country of the Hergetes, a people of Tarraconian Spain. It now belongs to the kingdom of Arragon.

(C) This was a true fetch in politics. Sertorius knew how to ingratiate himself with the people by the same means that assured him of their fidelity. Alexander the Great had done the same thing before him.

Aureæ, which were at Rome the chief diſtinction of children of high birth. At this time a cuſtom prevailed among the Spaniards and Luſitanians, that when a great commander was ſlain in battle, all thoſe who attended him died with him, either by the enemy's ſwords, or their own. This the inhabitants called an offering, or devoting of themſelves (D). Of theſe Sertorius had many thouſands, all reſolved to ſacrifice their lives for his ſafety, and ſtand by him to the laſt. Plutarch tells us, that his army being once defeated near a city in Spain, and the enemy preſſing hard upon his broken troops, they forgetful of their own danger, and concerned only for their general, took him upon their ſhoulders, and paſſing him from one to another, conveyed him into the city, and then ſhifted, in the beſt manner they could for themſelves. Nay, his ſoldiers not only revered him as an invincible general, but as a man inſpired and a favourite of heaven. This opinion he gained among the ſuperſtitious Luſitanians by ſeveral artifices, and deluding impoſtures, among which that of the hind was none of the leaſt. A Luſitanian, by name Spanus, meeting one day a doe, which in flying from the hunters had juſt dropped a hind-calf, took up the fawn, and brought it to Ser-

(D) The ſame cuſtom obtained in Gaul, where a number of reſolute men, called Soldurii, devoted themſelves to a prince, or ſome great commander, to ſhare with him both his good and bad fortune, and either to fall with him in battle, or kill themſelves in caſe he was defeated. This was a point of honour, wherein none of them were ever known to fail (17). Dion tells us, that one Sextus Pacuvius or Apudius devoted himſelf in full ſenate to Auguſtus, after the manner of the Spaniards, and would have forced all the reſt to follow his example. But this was the action of a vile mercenary flatterer, who meant nothing of what he ſaid, and did it only to ingratiate himſelf with his prince; wherein indeed he ſucceeded, for in courts hypocriſy often prevails over truth. This cuſtom did not only prevail in Gaul and Spain, but in many other parts of the world, and in our days in the iſland of Ceylan and in the kingdom of Tunquin. Thoſe who thus devote themſelves are in ſome places called the king's vaſſals in this world and in the next. We wiſh Plutarch had told us by what name thoſe heroic perſons were diſtinguiſhed in Spain, as Cæſar has acquainted us what thoſe of the ſame order were called in Gaul.

(17) Cæſar de bell. Gall. iii.

He makes uſe of a hind to impoſe upon the ſuperſtitious Luſitanians.

torius, who uſed to reward very liberally thoſe who preſented him with fruit, fowls, or veniſon. As the young hind was milk-white, the general was wonderfully taken with it, reared it up with great care, and made it ſo tame, that it followed him where-ever he went, without being in the leaſt frightened at the noiſe and hurry of the camp. As he was well acquainted with the ſuperſtition and credulity of the Luſitanians, he gave out by degrees, that the hind was inſpired, that it was given him by Diana, and that it diſcovered hidden myſteries. When he received any private intelligence of the enemy's deſigns or motions, he pretended, that the hind had informed him of them in his ſleep, and charged him to keep his forces in readineſs. Upon the firſt notice of any advantage gained by the officers, who commanded under him, he uſed to bring forth the hind crowned with flowers, and encourage his ſoldiers to return thanks to the gods for the account they ſhould ſoon receive of ſome proſperous ſucceſs (E). By theſe and ſuch-like devices he brought the Luſitanians to look upon him as a man ſent them from heaven, or rather as a god under the appearance of a man. Hence Metellus, though an old and experienced general, could not, during Sylla's life-time, gain the leaſt advantage over him, or prevail upon one city to declare againſt him. When Sylla was dead, the republic, alarmed at the extraordinary progreſs Sertorius made in Luſitania, reſolved to ſend another general againſt him with ſuch a force as might cruſh him at once. All the officers of any note in Rome earneſtly ſolicited ſo honourable a commiſſion, and among the reſt Pompey, who had juſt ſuppreſſed the troubles raiſed by Lepidus. We are told, that though all was quiet in Rome, Pompey ſtill kept his army on foot in the neighbourhood of the city, and under various pretences refuſed to diſband it, till the ſenate at laſt thought fit to decree him the government of Luſitania. L. Philippus was the firſt who made this motion in the the ſenate, which was oppoſed by ſeveral ſenators, who were againſt beſtowing ſo honourable an employment on a young man, before he had paſſed through the inferior offices. One of them ſurpriſed at the motion, aſked Philippus, whether his meaning was, that Pompey ſhould be ſent into Spain proconſul, that is, inſtead of a conſul. No, replied Philippus, but pro conſulibus, that is, inſtead of both conſuls, intimating thereby, that the conſuls for the year were men of no merit, and incapable of managing the war in that province. After a long and warm debate a decree paſſed, appointing Pompey commander in chief of the army, that was to march into Luſitania to the aſſiſtance of Metellus. It was no ſooner paſſed, than Pompey ſet out from Rome, at the head of the troops he had kept together after the defeat of Lepidus [z].

(E) We meet in antient hiſtory with many examples of ſuch devices, made uſe of by the greateſt generals, and wiſeſt law-givers, the better to impoſe on the ſuperſtition and credulity of the people. A few years before, Marius, as we have related above, impoſed upon his ſoldiers by a Syrian woman, who paſſed for a great propheteſs, and by tame vultures, which he had accuſtomed to follow him, and come to him, when called. Theſe juggling tricks were not only practiſed in the times of ignorance and darkneſs, but are renewed in our days, in the days of the greateſt light and knowledge.

Pompey appointed to command againſt Sertorius.

In the mean time, the republic choſe for her new conſuls Cn. Octavius Nepos and Caius Curio, who made it their whole buſineſs to ſupport the regulations Sylla had made againſt the attempts of the tribunes of the people. The dictator had reduced their power almoſt to nothing, but upon his death their ambition revived. At the head of the college was at this time one Cneius Sicinius, whoſe chief talent was buffoonry, the art of mimicking, and turninginto ridicule the moſt proper geſtures and moſt ſerious diſcourſes of the greateſt orators. Though he was a man of no principles or probity, yet he had found means to pleaſe the multitude; and, depending upon their favour, he had the confidence to ſummon the conſuls to appear in the comitium, and there give an account why they deprived the tribunes of their antient prerogatives. The conſuls obeyed the ſummons, and on the day appointed appeared before the people, when Curio ſpoke with all the dignity of a conſul and all the force of a great orator, ſhewing, that the late diſturbances owed their riſe to the abuſe of the too great power which the tribunes had uſurped. While he was ſpeaking, Sicinius mimicked all his geſtures and motions, making wry faces to divert the attention of the people. But all in vain; truth prevailed over the fondneſs of the populace for buffoonries; the tribunes continued in the ſame low condition, to which Sylla had reduced them, and the patricians triumphed. The whole glory of this victory was owing to Curio; for his collegue Octavius, who was troubled with the rheumatiſm, kept the whole time a profound found ſilence, ſitting on the roſtra wrapped up in linen, an covered over with plaiſters, which gave the facetious tr bune an opportunity to rally him, as he came down fro the roſtra, and tell him with a ſneer, That he was oblige to his collegue, who, by throwing himſelf about as uſua had ſaved him from being devoured by the flies. In ſhor Sicinius was ſo very witty, that he was aſſaſſinated befo his office expired, and the republic delivered from a dange rous citizen [a].

The tribunes attempt the recovery of their former power.

[z] Plut. in Pomp. & Sertor.

Julius Cæſar begins to ſhine at the bar.

THIS year Julius Cæſar, tho' but twenty-two years o age, began to ſhine at the bar. After he had ſignalized hi valour at the ſiege of Mitylene, as we have related above he applied himſelf to the ſtudy of eloquence, and this yea accuſed Cn. Cornelius Dolabella, formerly prætor of Ma cedon, and honoured with the conſulate and a triumph. He charged him with male-adminiſtration; but Quintus Hortenſius and Caius Aurelius Cotta, the two greateſt ora tors in Rome, pleaded with ſo much eloquence in favour of the accuſed, that he was acquitted. However, Cæſar gained the reputation of being one of the beſt orators of his age, and would have challenged the firſt place among men of that character, had he not proved, to the great misfortune of the republic, one of her greateſt warriors (F). Not long after he had accuſed Dolabella, he embarqued for Rhodes, with a deſign to improve himſelf in the art of oratory under Apollonius, one of the greateſt rhetoricians of his time; but he was taken in his paſſage by ſome pirates, who, with a few

[a] Cic. in Bruto. Quintil. l. xi. & Plut. in Craſſo.

(F) In his pleadings, ſays Plutarch (18), he appeared with all the graces of an excellent orator, and gained much upon the affections of the people by the eaſineſs of his addreſs and converſation, in which he was accompliſhed beyond what could be expected from his age. He was by nature excellently framed, ſays the ſame writer, for a perfect ſtateſman and orator, and took great pains to improve his genius that way in his youth; but he never roſe up to that pitch of eloquence, to which nature would have carried him, being diverted by thoſe expeditions and deſigns, which at length gained him the empire, whence he himſelf, in his anſwer to Cicero's panegyric on Cato, deſires his reader not to compare the plain diſcourſe of a ſoldier with the ſtudied harangues of an orator, who was not only endued with fine parts, but had employed his whole life in this one ſtudy (19).

(18) Plut. in Cæſare. (19) Idem ibid.

a few large ſhips and a vaſt number of ſmall veſſels, infeſted thoſe ſeas. When they demanded twenty talents for his ranſom, he ſmiled at them, as not underſtanding the value of their priſoner, and voluntarily engaged to pay them fifty, that is nine thouſand ſix hundred and eighty-ſeven pounds ten ſhillings. Accordingly he diſpatched ſome of his domeſtics to raiſe the ſum he had promiſed in the neighbouring cities, and in the mean time remained in the hands of thoſe robbers, with only one friend and two attendants. During the thirty-eight days he ſpent among them, he applied himſelf to the ſtudy of eloquence and poetry, wrote verſes, and compoſed ſpeeches, which he repeated to them, reproaching thoſe who did not admire them with barbarity and ignorance. He converſed familiarly with them; but always treated them with an high hand, and often in raillery threatened to have them crucified, if they diſturbed him when he had a mind to ſleep. The pirates, aſcribing this free way of talking to ſimplicity and a juvenile vivacity, were mightily taken with it. When his ranſom came, which the Mileſians raiſed by a tax upon themſelves, he immediately paid it; and being diſcharged, he went directly to Miletus, manned ſome ſhips there, and with them ſurpriſed the pirates, took moſt of them priſoners, and carried them to Pergamus. As it belonged to Junius, at that time prætor of Aſia, to determine their puniſhment, Cæſar applied to him, while he was taking a progreſs through the Aſiatic province. Junius, who was a very covetous man, and hoped to extort great ſums from the pirates, anſwered, That he would think at his leiſure what to do with the priſoners. Upon which Cæſar, taking his leave of him, returned to Pergamus, where he ordered the pirates to be brought forth and crucified; a puniſhment which he had often threatened them with while he was in their hands, and which they never dreamt he would be able ever to inflict upon them [b] (G). He then went to Rhodes, where he improved his talent for oratory, under the famous rhetorician Apollonius Molon (H), who at that time had Cicero for his auditor. In

His behaviour when taken by pirates.

Cauſes the pirates to be crucified.

[b] Plut. in Cæſare.

(G) Plutarch, in this place, contradicts Suetonius, whom we have followed. The former writer tells us, that Cæſar was taken by the pirates near the iſland of Pharmacuſa, on his return from Bithynia, where he had reſided ſome time, at the court of king Nicomedes, as we have related above.

(H) Plutarch calls Apollonius Molon's ſon, and of one man makes two; for Apollonius himſelf, and not his father, was called

In the mean time Pompey, having ſpent the winter in Narbonne Gaul, and in the beginning of the ſpring paſſed the led Molon, as is evident from Suetonius, Quintilian, and Cicero, who often call him Molon ſimply, without the addition of the other appellative; which would have been very improper, if he had been only the ſon of Molon. Plutarch falls into the ſame miſtake in the life of Cicero, as the learned Rualdus obſerves. Thus far M. Dacier, in her notes upon Plutarch. But that learned critic is certainly miſtaken, it being evident from Strabo, that Molon and Apollonius were two different men; for he tells us in expreſs terms, that Molon and Apollonius were both natives of Alabanda, a city of Caria; that they were both ſcholars of Menecles the Alabandian; and that they both profeſſed the ſame art at Rhodes, tho' Molon went thither later than Apollonius, who, on that account, applied to him that of Homer 'Οψὲ Μόλων; for he was likewiſe called by ſome Molon, by others Μαλακὸς, or the Soft (20). Cicero likewiſe diſtinguiſhes them, calling the one Molon, and the other Apollonius the Alabandian, eſpecially in his firſt book de oratore, where he introduces M. Antonius ſpeaking of him thus: For this one thing I always liked Apollonius the Alabandian; tho' he taught for money, he did not ſuffer any, whom he thought incapable of becoming orators, to loſe their time and labour with him; but ſent them home, exhorting them to apply their minds to that art, for which they were, in his opinion, beſt qualified. It were much to be wiſhed, that thoſe who, in our days, ſet up for teachers and ſchoolmaſters, were as honeſt and diſintereſted as Apollonius. Of this Apollonius Plutarch relates, that as he was not well verſed in the Latin tongue, he deſired Cicero to declaim in Greek. The Roman was mightily pleaſed with this motion, ſuppoſing, that Apollonius could better correct him, in caſe he ſhould ſay any thing amiſs; but while thoſe who were preſent, amazed at his eloquence and the purity of his diction, ſtrove to outdo one another in commending him, Apollonius neither expreſſed any ſatisfaction in his countenance while his diſciple was ſpeaking, nor applauded him after he had done; but, without uttering a word, continued in his place muſing and penſive. When he obſerved Cicero to be uneaſy at this behaviour, he addreſſed him thus: Take courage, Cicero; I both praiſe and admire you; but I am ſorry for poor Greece, when I ſee the two only ornaments that were left us, learning and eloquence, transferred by you from us to the Romans. This Apollonius ſupplied Apion the grammarian, if Joſephus is to be credited (21), with the many falſhoods he publiſhed againſt the Jews and their temple.

(20) Strabo, l. xiv. p. 655, 660, 661. (21) Joſeph. contra. Apion. l. ii.

the Pyrenees, after having ſurmounted the obſtacles which ſome Gauliſh nations threw in his way, appeared on the frontiers of Hither Spain. There he was informed, that the Roman troops, under the command of Perperna, or Perpenna, had, in ſpite of their general, joined Sertorius, and taken the military oath to him. Perperna, after the death of Lepidus, whoſe lieutenant he was, had got together the remains of his army, amounting to fifty-three cohorts, that is, about thirty-two thouſand men, and had marched with them into Spain, intending to ſettle there, as Sertorious had done, and to make war with Metellus by himſelf, thinking it below a man of his birth and rank to act in ſubordination to one, who was not even a Roman; but when his ſoldiers underſtood, that Pompey had paſſed the Pyrenees at the head of a mighty army, they took up their arms and enſigns, and threatened to abandon Perperna, if he did not inſtantly lead them to Sertorius, and reſign the command to a general, who was able to defend himſelf and thoſe who ſerved under him. Perperna complied, tho' much againſt his will, with their deſire, joined Sertorius, and ſerved under him as a ſubaltern. Sertorius, now at the head of a very conſiderable army, took the field, in order to ſtop the progreſs of Pompey, whoſe high character, founded on many glorious exploits, was a ſtrong prejudice in his favour. He was in the flower of his age, at moſt about thirty, had been honoured ſome years before with a triumph and the ſurname of Great, and was now empowered to act ſeparately and independently of Metellus, with the title of proconſul. Upon his arrival, ſeveral cities, which had hitherto continued faithful to Sertorius, began to waver, and ſeemed inclined to open their gates to a general, whoſe great fame had already reached the moſt remote corners of Spain. Sertorius therefore, to prevent their defection by ſome ſignal action, and to make them ſenſible that Pompey's protection could avail them little againſt his power and reſentment, entered the province of Hither Spain, which was moſt devoted to the republic, and there, tho' Pompey was advancing full march againſt him, laid ſiege to Lauron, now Liria, a ſtrong city on the banks of the Turia. Pompey, not doubting but he ſhould be able to raiſe the ſiege, marched quite up to the enemy's lines, and thinking he had encloſed them between his own army and the city, found means to convey a meſſenger into the place, to acquaint the garriſon, that thoſe who beſieged them were themſelves beſieged, and would be Perperna retires to Spain.

His troops join Sertorius.

Sertorius beſieges Lauron.

ſoon ſoon obliged to retire with ſhame and diſgrace. Sertorius, when informed of this meſſage, ſmiled, and turning to the officers about him, I will teach Sylla's diſciple, ſaid he, that it is the duty of a general to look as well behind him as before him. Having thus ſpoke, he ſent orders to a detachment of ſix thouſand men, who lay concealed among the mountains, to draw near to Pompey, and fall upon his rear, if he ſhould offer to force the lines. Pompey, ſurprized at their ſudden appearance, durſt not ſtir out of his camp; but was forced to ſit ſtill, and ſee his friends and confederates ruined before his face: for the beſieged, deſpairing of relief, delivered themſelves up to Sertorius, who ſpared their lives and granted them their liberty; but burnt their city, not out of anger or cruelty, to which Sertorius was an utter ſtranger, but that it might be ſaid, for the greater confuſion of the admirers of Pompey, that tho' he was ſo near the fire, which burnt down a confederate city, as to be well warmed by it, yet it was not able to raiſe heat enough in him to make him attempt the relief of it [b]. Frontinus tells us, that Pompey, without coming to a general action, loſt, during the ſiege of Lauron, ten thouſand men, cut off in ſmall parties by Sertorius's horſe, who were continually ſcouring the plains and intercepting all the enemy's convoys [c]. However that be, it is certain, that Pompey, after the ſurrender of the place, retired with Metellus to the foot of the Pyrenees, and there, without putting their troops into winter-quarters as uſual, ſuffered all the rigour of the ſeaſon in tents, being afraid of a ſurprize from a general, whom they both dreaded and admired.

And takes it before Pompey's face.

THE next year L. Octavius and Aurelius Cotta were choſen conſuls, and upon a complaint made, that the famine occaſioned in Rome by the Cilician pirates, who infeſted the ſeas, was owing to Sylla's having leſſened the power of the tribunes of the people, Cotta was weak enough to give up one point in their favour, to the great prejudice of the republic. He conſented, that, for the future, the tribunes might be promoted to ſuperior offices, contrary to a law enacted by Sylla. Thus they began to recover by degrees their former power, which, in the end, proved the ruin of the republican government [d].

The tribunes of the people begin to recover their former power.

BUT to return to Spain. As ſoon as the ſeaſon was proper for action, Metellus took the field, and marched againſt Hirtuleius, [b] Plut. in Pomp. & Sertor. [c] Front. ſtrat. l. i. c. 5.

[d] Appian. bell. civil. l. i. Salluſt. in fragment. Plut. in Cic.

Hirtuleius, one of Sertorius's lieutenants, engaged him, and, after a moſt obſtinate diſpute which laſted the whole day, put him to flight. Hirtuleius loſt in the action twenty thouſand men, was himſelf dangerouſly wounded, and very narrowly eſcaped falling into the enemy's hands [c]. Sertorius, upon the news of this overthrow, advanced with all poſſible expedition to the banks of the Sucro in Tarraconian Spain, intending to attack Pompey, who was encamped there, before he could be joined by Metellus, and by that means repair the loſs which his lieutenant had ſuſtained. On the other hand, Pompey, fearing Metellus ſhould ſhare with him the glory of the victory, made what haſte he could to engage Sertorius before his arrival. However, Sertorius, conſidering that the darkneſs of the night would be a great diſadvantage to the enemy, whether they were conquerors or conquered, none of them being acquainted with the country, delayed engaging till the cloſe of the day, and then advanced in order of battle againſt his rival, whoſe troops were drawn up in a large plain on the banks of the Sucro. Pompey, tho' well appriſed of the enemy's deſign in putting off the engagement till the evening, would not decline it, for fear Metellus ſhould in the mean time join him with his victorious troops, and rob him in great meaſure of the glory, which he promiſed himſelf from conquering a commander of ſo great reputation. The attack was begun with equal valour on both ſides. Pompey, who commanded his own right wing, ſoon obliged Perperna, who commanded the enemy's left wing, to give way. Hereupon Sertorius, committing the care of his right wing to his lieutenants, flew to the aſſiſtance of the left; and having, what by promiſes, what by menaces, brought his flying troops back to the charge, fell upon Pompey with ſuch fury, that, in ſpight of his utmoſt efforts, he was forced to give way, and betake himſelf to flight. As he was flying, an African of a gigantic ſize, who purſued cloſe, had already lifted up his arm to diſcharge a blow at him with his broad ſword; but Pompey, more active and nimble than the unwieldly African, prevented him by cutting off his hand at the firſt blow. He then continued his flight; but, being wounded and thrown from his horſe, he would have been made priſoner, had not the Africans, who purſued him, quarrelled about his horſe's golden trappings and rich capariſon. While they were dividing the ſpoil, Pompey made his eſcape, and, with much-ado, being Hirtuleius entirely defeated by Metellus.

A battle between Pompey and Sertorius.

Pompey defeated.

[c] Front. ibid.

ing wounded in the thigh with an arrow, reached his camp. On the other hand, Afranius, who commanded the left wing of the Roman army, had all the advantage over the wing Sertorius had left; he put them into diſorder, forced them to retire in confuſion, and purſued them ſo cloſe, that he entered the enemy's camp with the fugitives; but while his troops were buſy in rifling the tents, Sertorius came upon them unexpectedly, made a dreadful ſlaughter of them at the head of his victorious forces, and retook his camp. Early next morning, Sertorius drew up his army in the ſame plain, being reſolved to venture a ſecond engagement, which he had taken proper meaſures to make deciſive; but in the mean time Metellus coming up, he drew off, and returned to his camp, ſaying, Had it not been for the old woman, meaning Metellus, I would have whipt the boy ſoundly, and ſent him back to Rome[f].

At this time Sertorius was greatly concerned for the loſs of his hind, which had gone aſtray, being frightened with the noiſe and hurry of the late battle. He was thereby deſtitute of an admirable contrivance to encourage the ſuperſtitious people, and inſpire them with an awful reſpect for his perſon; but by good fortune, ſome of his men who were wandering about in the night, meeting her and knowing her by her colour, retook her. The general was overjoyed with the news, and promiſed an ample reward to thoſe who had found her, provided they kept it ſecret and locked her up carefully. A few days after he appeared in public with a chearful countenance, and declared to the chief nobility, that the gods had foretold him in a dream, that ſome extraordinary good fortune would ſoon attend him. He then aſcended his tribunal, and while he was there adminiſtering juſtice and giving audience to his officers and ſoldiers, the favourite hind being let looſe, purſuant to his directions, no ſooner diſcovered her maſter, than ſhe ran bounding to him with great joy, leaped on the tribunal, laid her head in his lap, and licked his hand. Sertorius in return ſtroaked and careſſed her with all the tokens of a real tenderneſs and affection, inſomuch, that tears ran down his cheeks. All thoſe who were preſent, filled with wonder and aſtoniſhment, proclaimed him above the rank of common men, looked upon him as a perſon highly favoured by the gods, and with with reſpectful congratulations and loud ſhouts of joy, attended him to his tent, proteſting, that they were ready to ſhed the laſt drop of their blood in his defence[g].

[f] Plut. in Pomp. & Sertor.

SERTORIUS, not thinking it adviſeable to engage Pompey and Metellus at the ſame time, retired in the night from his camp; and, upon his retreat, Pompey, went out to receive and welcome Metellus. As he drew near, Pompey, out of reſpect to him as his ſuperior officer, ordered his lictors to lower their faſces; but Metellus would not aſſume any diſtinction, except that of giving the watch-word to the whole army, while they encamped together. As a perfect harmony reigned both between the generals and the two armies, they agreed to march after Sertorius, and attack him in his new poſt. They found his army divided into two bodies, one commanded by Perperna, the other by himſelf. After they had continued ſome days in ſight of each other, Metellus fell upon Perperna, and Pompey led his forces againſt Sertorius, in hopes of recovering the reputation he had loſt in the late battle. The engagement was ſo furious and obſtinate, that it laſted the whole day; but in the end Pompey was defeated anew and put to flight, after having loſt ſix thouſand men, among whom was Memmius, his lieutenant, and one of the greateſt officers of his time. On the other hand, Metellus put Perperna to flight, and killed five thouſand of his men; but Sertorius, having rallied the fugitives and renewed the fight, repulſed Metellus in his turn, and cutting his way through the battalions that ſurrounded him, wounded him with his lance, and would have ſoon diſpatched him, had not his troops, aſhamed to leave their general in diſtreſs, returned to the charge. After they had reſcued Metellus they fell upon the Luſitanians, who attended Sertorius, with ſuch fury, that they obliged them to retire in great confuſion. The brave general, having attempted ſeveral times in vain to rally his troops and lead them back to the charge, was forced at length to quit the field. He withdrew to a city among the mountains, not that he deſigned to ſtand a ſiege there, but only to deceive Pompey and Metellus. Accordingly the two generals, giving over the purſuit of the Luſitanians, haſtened to lay ſiege to the place whither Sertorius had retreated; but while they were forming their Pompey defeated anew.

Sertorius obliged by Metellus to quit the field.

[g] Idem ibid.

their camp, he made a ſally, and eſcaped with his troops croſs the mountains into Luſitania, where he raiſed a ſufficient number of forces to enable him to keep the field. All the cities in his intereſt ſent him ſupplies of men, money, and proviſions, with ſuch expedition, that in a very ſhort time he appeared again at the head of a formidable army, and offered the two generals battle, which they wiſely declined; but they could not avoid the continual attacks of Sertorius, who fell upon them from all quarters, drove them from poſt to poſt, and, by intercepting all their convoys, reduced them to ſuch ſtreights, that they were obliged to ſeparate and retire, Metellus into Gaul, and Pompey into the country of the Vaccœi, whom Iſidorus places at the foot of the Pyrenees. From thence he wrote a doleful letter to the ſenate, demanding a ſpeedy ſupply of men and money, acquainting them with the wretched condition his troops were in, and adding, that if they delayed ſending him powerful reinforcements, he ſhould be forced to return into Italy with his army. To ſuch extremities Sertorius brought the two greateſt commanders and moſt experienced warriors of his age[r].

Pompey and Metellus reduced to great ſtreights.

He was now in the height of his proſperity; but nevertheleſs, as he was a ſincere lover of his country and had a great deſire to return home, he ſent word to Metellus and Pompey, that he was ready to lay down his arms and lead a private life, provided the decree of his proſcription were repealed. This great deſire of ſeeing again his native country, was chiefly owing, as Plutarch informs us, to the tender affection and extraordinary reſpect he had for his mother, under whom he had been brought up with great care, having loſt his father when he was very young. When he afterwards received the melancholy news of her death, he was ſo much affected with it, that he had almoſt died himſelf of grief; he wept bitterly, and lay ſeven days together on the ground, without giving the word or being ſeen by his moſt intimate friends. The chief commanders of the army and perſons of the greateſt diſtinction, crowding round his tent, with much ado prevailed upon him to appear again in public, and take upon him the management of affairs, which were then in a very proſperous condition. All this plainly ſhews, that he was of a mild and compaſſionate temper, naturally inclined to lead a quiet life, and that he was driven by Sertorius offers to lay down his arms.

[r] Plut, ibid.

by his enemies to have recourſe to arms, contrary to his own inclination. What anſwer Pompey and Metellus returned him, hiſtorians have not told us. All we know is, that the decree of his proſcription was never repealed, nor he ſuffered to return to his native country.

In the mean time the fame of his noble exploits, and of the great advantages he gained every day over the two moſt renowned generals of the republic, flew as far as Aſia. Mithridates the Great had been obliged by Sylla, as we have related in our hiſtory of Pontus, to ſubmit to ſuch conditions of peace, as that general had been pleaſed to impoſe upon him; but after the deceaſe of Sylla, he raiſed a powerful army, with a deſign to renew the war, and improve the diſturbances of the republic to his advantage. As his court was at that time filled with proſcribed perſons, who had fled from Rome, theſe, eſpecially L. Magius and L. Fannius, adviſed him to enter into an alliance with Sertorius; and the king, purſuant to their advice, ſent embaſſadors into Spain, offering the Luſitanian general three thouſand talents and forty gallies completely fitted out, on condition that he would ſuffer him to reconquer thoſe provinces of Aſia, which he had been forced to give up in virtue of his treaty with Sylla. Upon the arrival of the embaſſadors, Sertorius called a council, when all to a man approved of the king's propoſals, and were very preſſing with Sertorius to comply with his requeſt, ſince he demanded nothing but an empty conſent to an undertaking, which they could no-ways prevent. And here we cannot ſufficiently admire the conſtancy and magnanimity of that brave commander, who, we may ſay, appeared greater in this glorious negotiation, than at the head of his army. Tho' it would have coſt him nothing to have granted Mithridates whatever he deſired, and ſuch a grant would have procured him great ſums and a conſiderable armament; yet he would not by any means hearken to the propoſal, ſaying, That it was his duty to enlarge the Roman dominions by his victories, and not to encreaſe his power by the diminution of the Roman territories. Having therefore ſent for the embaſſadors, he declared to them, that he was willing their maſter ſhould re-conquer Bithynia and Cappadocia, kingdoms to which the Romans had no right; but that he would not conſent he ſhould ſet foot in the province of Aſia, that is, the kingdom of Pergamus, which undoubtedly belonged to the common-wealth, and which he had given up by a solemn treaty. With this answer he dismissed the embassadors; and when the king heard it, he could not help admiring the magnanimity of Sertorius: What would not this Roman prescribe to us, said he, if he were at Rome, since from the shores of the Atlantic ocean, he takes upon him to set bounds to our kingdom, and threatens us with war, in case we should make any attempts upon Asia? However, the king of Pontus, knowing how advantageous it would prove to his designs to foment the civil war, concluded the treaty upon Sertorius's own terms. The king supplied him with three thousand talents and a fleet of forty gallies, and Sertorius sent to the king a body of troops, under the command of Marcus Marius, or, as others call him, Marcus Varius, one of the senators, who had been proscribed by Sylla[s].

Mithridates ſends embaſſadors to Sertorius.

Sertorius enters into an alliance with Mithridates.

WHILE Mithridates was making prodigious preparations for the war in Asia, and Sertorius in Spain, P. Servilius, with the title of proconsul, cleared the coasts and seas of the pirates who infested them, took Isaure their capital (I), and was honoured with the surname of Isauricus, and with a triumph for his success. The next year Licinius Lucullus and Aurelius Cotta were chosen consuls. The former by paying his court to a mistress of Cethegus, one of the tribunes of the people, got the command of the troops that were to be sent into Cilicia. His collegue was appointed to command the fleet that was to guard Bithynia against the invasion threatened by Mithridates; but before he set sail,

[s] Plut. in Sert. Cic. pro lege Manilia, & pro Murena. Liv. l. xciii Appian. in Mithridatic. Oros. l. vi. c. 2.

(I) Isaure, called afterwards Isauropolis, and now Saura, was the capital of Isauria, a country of Asia Minor, comprehending part of mount Taurus and the mountains between Cilicia, Lycaonia, and Pamphylia. This city, in Pliny's time, had lost much of its antient splendor. Servilius, besides Isaure, reduced several other cities, viz. Phaselis, Olympus, and Coricus, which were retreats for pirates. The first stood on the confines of Lycia and Pamphylia. Its inhabitants, who were for the most part pirates, made use of a sort of brigantine, which from them was called phaselus. They were so poor, according to the antients, that they sacrificed nothing but salt-fish to their gods; and hence the proverb, sacrificium Phaselitarum, to signify a mean present or offering. The city of Olympus stood on the sea-coast of Cilicia; and that of Coricus was a famous port in the same country, and is now known by the name of Curco.

ſail, he procured an unlimited commiſſion for M. Antonius, the father of the triumvir, which was that of guarding all the ſea-coaſts ſubject to the republic. He ſet out with great confidence in queſt of the pirates, and engaged them off the iſland of Crete; but he had the mortification to ſee moſt of his ſhips taken, and his men hanged to the maſts, with the chains which he had prepared for the enemy. This ſight ſo grieved him, that he died a few days after [t]. In the mean time Cotta arriving in Bithynia, found Mithridates in motion at the head of a mighty army. All the cities of Paphlagonia opened their gates to him, imagining, that, in ſubmitting to him, they ſubmitted to the authority of Rome, becauſe Marius, whom Sertorius had ſent into Aſia in quality of proconſul, always marched before the king's troops, attended by his lictors with their faſces. The Bithynians likewiſe would readily have revolted, had not Julius Cæſar, who had retired to Rhodes, as we have related above, upon the news of their motions, croſſed over to the continent, raiſed troops without any commiſſion, and, driving the king's emiſſaries out of the country, kept the cities, which were ready to revolt, ſteady to their duty. This was, as it were, the firſt eſſay of this young commander, who, tho' only twenty-four years of age, already equalled the oldeſt generals in prudence and bravery [u]. On the other hand, the conſul Cotta, being defeated in a ſea engagement by the fleet of Mithridates, was forced to take refuge in Chalcedon, where he was cloſely beſieged; but his collegue Lucullus, marching to his relief, obliged Mithridates to retire. The king went from thence to beſiege Cyzicus; but was obliged by Lucullus to drop that enterprize, after having loſt the greateſt part of his army, which, when he ſat down before the place, was three hundred thouſand ſtrong. The Roman, encouraged with this ſucceſs, took ſeveral places from the enemy, and put an end to the campaign by a complete victory over the king's fleet, as we have related in our hiſtory of Pontus, to which we refer our readers for a full account of what we have only hinted at in this place.

M. Antonius defeated by the pirates.

The ſucceſs of Lucullus againſt Mithridates.

THE republic was no leſs ſucceſsful in Spain than in Aſia. The ſenators and other patricians who ſerved under Sertorius, thinking they could now make head againſt the enemy without him, began to be jealous of his glory. They were headed by Perperna, who was continually inveighing, both in private and public, againſt Sertorius and his ſenate. That ambitious patrician could not brook the authority which he had aſſumed over his army, and flattering himſelf that he ſhould ſucceed him in the command of all the troops in Luſitania, he plotted his ruin, and drew into the conſpiracy ſeveral officers, pretending, that Sertorius ſlighted the Romans, and confided only in the Luſitanians. The conſpirators, not daring at firſt to make any attempt upon his life, by reaſon of the great affection the Luſitanians bore him, did all that lay in their power to alienate their minds from him, and ſecretly deſtroy his intereſt among them. With this view the governors of the cities abuſed the inhabitants, puniſhed them with the utmoſt ſeverity, and loaded them with taxes, giving out, that all this was done by the expreſs order of Sertorius. Hereupon ſeveral cities revolted, and great diſturbances were raiſed all over Luſitania. Sertorius ſent perſons, in whom he thought he could confide, to appeaſe the mutineers; but thoſe, in whom he repoſed moſt confidence, being gained over by his enemies, proved traitors to him, and inſtead of mitigating the people by gentle methods, exaſperated them with an unſeaſonable ſeverity, and left them at their departure more obſtinate and more inclined to revolt, than they had found them. This incenſed Sertorius to ſuch a degree, that he cauſed ſome of the children of the Luſitanians, who were educated at Oſca, to be put to death, and ſold others for ſlaves. This is the only piece of cruelty and injuſtice, which the author of Sertorius's life can lay to his charge (K); on all other occaſions he ſhewed a mildneſs of temper hardly to be matched [w].

A conſpiracy againſt Sertorius.

[t] Cic. act. 2. in Verr. Flor. l. iii. c. 7. Liv. l. xciv. [u] Suet. in Julio, c. 4. Vell. Paterc. l ii. c. 42.

His ſeverity to the Spaniſh hoſtages.

In

[w] Plut. ibid.

(K) However, he endeavours to excuſe it, and reaſons thus: "The cruelty which Sertorius practiſed upon the Spaniſh hoſtages ſeems to argue, that his clemency was not natural, but only acted as his affairs required. As to my own opinion, I am perſuaded that true virtue, eſtabliſhed by reaſon and mature judgment, can never be totally perverted and extirpated by any misfortune whatever; not that I think it impoſſible, but that great indignities offered without cauſe, and frequent abuſes put upon thoſe of the beſt nature and moſt virtuous inclinations, may make ſome impreſſion and alteration in their temper; and thus

In the mean time the baſe Perperna encreaſed the number of the conſpirators, and, amongſt others, drew in Manlius, one of the chief officers of the army. This Manlius, having conceived a ſhameful paſſion for a young Roman, diſcloſed to him the whole conſpiracy, telling him, that he ſhould ſoon ſee him at the head of the army. The youth diſcovered to one Aufidus what he had learnt of Manlius; but as Aufidus himſelf was one of the conſpirators, and knew not that Manlius was any-ways engaged in the plot, he made ſlight of what the youth ſaid; but when the young Roman named Perperna, Gracinus, Q. Fabius, Tarquitius, Sertorius's two ſecretaries, and ſeveral others, who, Aufidus well knew, were all in the plot, he went immediately to Perperna, gave him notice of the danger they were in, and ſolicited him immediately to put their deſign in execution. Accordingly Perperna, with the conſent of the other conſpirators, pitched on that very day; and they all agreed to aſſaſſinate him at an entertainment, to which no body but he and the conſpirators ſhould be invited. As it was no eaſy matter to engage him in a party of pleaſure, they had recourſe to artifice, and provided a meſſenger, who brought to him feigned letters, giving him notice of a ſignal victory obtained by one of his lieutenants over Pompey and Metellus. He was ſo well pleaſed with this news, that he readily came into the propoſal of the perfidious Perperna, and promiſed to paſs the evening with him and his friends in mirth and jollity. Accordingly, after he had returned ſolemn thanks to the gods for the pretended ſucceſs, he went to Perperna's quarters, to rejoice with him upon the new victory. At all entertainments, where Sertorius was preſent, great order and decency was obſerved; for they all

" thus, I ſuppoſe, it happened to Sertorius, who, being exaſpe-
" rated by repeated injuries of ungrateful perſons, was at laſt ſe-
" vere to thoſe who had wrongfully injured him." Thus far Plutarch (22). What that writer did not think impoſſible, is not only poſſible, but very common; for nothing can be truer, than what Electra ſays in Sophocles; It is very difficult, my friends, for any one in my condition to keep within due bounds, and not repine at providence. Such woful calamities change our very nature, and force us, in ſpite of ourſelves, to become wicked. This is the only reaſon that can be offered as an excuſe for Sertorius.

(22) Plut. in Sert.

knew, that he could not bear any looſe and indecent diſcourſes: but in the midſt of this entertainment, the conſpirators, pretending to be warmed with wine, began to talk very looſely, on purpoſe to provoke their general and pick a quarrel with him. Sertorius, offended at their indecent and diſreſpectful behaviour, changed his poſture, and leaning backward, pretended not to hear or regard them. Then Perperna, taking a cup full of wine, let it fall, as he was drinking, out of his hand, which was the ſignal agreed on. Upon this Antonius, who was next to Sertorius, drew his poniard and wounded him. The brave general ſtrove to raiſe himſelf, but Antonius, throwing himſelf upon his breaſt, held both his hands, ſo that, without being in the leaſt able to defend himſelf, he lay expoſed to the fury of the reſt of the conſpirators, who fell upon him and diſpatched him. Sertorius was, without contradiction, one of the greateſt ſoldiers the republic had ever bred. Rome was ſo fully convinced of it, that ſhe ſent againſt him two of the greateſt generals ſhe had, Metellus and Pompey; but the glory, which theſe two renowned warriors had acquired elſewhere, was eclipſed in Spain: they could never gain any conſiderable advantage over the Luſitanian general, and were at laſt by him driven quite out of the field, and forced to ſhelter themſelves either in Gaul, or among the moſt inacceſſible mountains. Pompey, who had been honoured in his youth with a triumph and the ſurname of Great, and had filled all Italy, Sicily, and Africa with the fame of his exploits, gained nothing in Spain, ſo long as Sertorius lived, but ſhame and diſgrace.

Sertorius aſſaſſinated.

Upon his death, the treacherous Perperna took upon him the command of the army; but ſoon made it appear, that he underſtood no more how to command, than how to obey; for Pompey, who had continued for ſome time inactive in a corner of Hither Spain, no ſooner heard of Sertorius's death, than he left the place of his retreat, marched againſt Perperna, gained an eaſy and complete victory over him, and took the traitor himſelf priſoner. As Perperna had, on Sertorius's death, ſeized on all his papers, he offered to ſhew Pompey letters from the greateſt men in Rome, inviting him into Italy; but Pompey, not vouchſafing to ſee the perfidious wretch, ordered him to ſend to him all Sertorius's papers and writings ſealed up. He no ſooner received them, than he cauſed them to be burnt unopened, in the preſence of all the officers of his army; and immediately after ordered Perperna to be put to death, leſt he ſhould name any Perperna defeated and taken.

Perperna put to death.

of

of Sertorius's correſpondents, and by that means give occaſion to new diſturbances. As to the reſt of the conſpirators, ſome of them were taken and put to death by Pompey's order; others fled into Africa, where they were murdered by the Mauritanians. In a ſhort time not one of them was left alive, except Aufidus, who, not being much enquired after, died many years after in an obſcure village of Spain, in extreme poverty and abhorred by all [x]. The death of Perperna put an end to the war, which had employed the greateſt generals and the beſt forces of the republic almoſt ten years. Pompey, tho' he gained little reputation by this expedition, ye he had the glory of ending it ſucceſsfully. He continued ſome time in Spain, to reduce the rebellious cities, and then returned with his army into Italy.

The war in Spain ended. Year of the Flood, 2930. Before Chriſt, 69. Of Rome, 679.

SCARCE was the rebellion in Spain at an end, when a new ſtorm aroſe in the heart of Italy. In the next conſulate of Terentius Varro and Caſſius Varus, ſome ſlaves of Capua, having broke their chains, took up arms, and, under the conduct of Spartacus, a Thracian gladiator of uncommon abilities, firſt defeated the Capuan militia, and afterwards Claudius Pulcher, a Roman prætor, at the head of three thouſand men. Theſe ſucceſsful beginnings ſo raiſed the reputation of Spartacus, that he ſoon ſaw himſelf at the head of ten thouſand men, whom he led againſt the prætor Vatinius, and gave him a total overthrow. He then marched into Ciſalpine Gaul, with a deſign to give his troops, who were moſtly Gauls, an opportunity of returning into their own country; for he found them ungovernable, and therefore incapable of carrying on a war. But the next year, when Gellius Poplicola and Cornelius Lentulus were conſuls, Cnixus, one of the chiefs of the Gauliſh ſlaves, ſeparated from him, and marched back into Apulia, where he was attacked and cut in pieces with his whole army, by the conſul Gellius and the proconſul Anius. Upon the news of this defeat, Spartacus, who was in Ciſalpine Gaul, and had nothing elſe in view but to paſs the Alps and take ſhelter among the Tranſalpine Gauls, turned back, and falling upon the conſul Lentulus, who purſued him, gave him a total overthrow. Then, without delay, he marched in queſt of the conſul Gellius, defeated his victorious army, and obliged both him and his troops to ſhelter themſelves behind the walls of their cities. Never was the proud republic

The war of the ſlaves under Spartacus. Cnixus defeated. Spartacus defeats both the conſuls.

[x] Plut. in Sert. & Pomp.

public more humbled. Her two conſuls and her invincible legions were forced to fly, in a ſhameful manner, before a Thracian, a gladiator, and a ſlave. Spartacus would not give quarter to any of the Roman priſoners, but in honour of Cnixus ſacrificed them all round his funeral pile. As his army now conſiſted of an hundred and twenty thouſand men, all fugitive ſlaves, he ravaged moſt of the provinces of Italy, without the leaſt oppoſition, and then returned into Lucania, poſted himſelf on the mountains near Thurii, and erected magazines in that city for the ſupport of his numerous army.

Craſſus ſent againſt Spartacus.

THE next year, when Auſidius Oreſtes and Lentulus Sura were conſuls, the ſenate gave the conduct of the war againſt the rebellious gladiators to Licinius Craſſus, one of the chief commanders of Sylla's party, and who had a great ſhare in moſt of his victories. Craſſus, having raiſed in a few days ſix legions, detached Mummius, one of his lieutenants, with two of them, to watch the enemy's motions, while he came up with the reſt of the army. The raſh lieutenant no ſooner diſcovered the enemy, than he drew up his troops in battalia, and challenged Spartacus, contrary to the expreſs orders of his general. The Thracian accepted the challenge, and put the Romans to flight at the firſt onſet. Craſſus ſoon after arrived, and having reprimanded Mummius in the ſevereſt terms, he cauſed five hundred legionaries, who had retired at the approach of the enemy, to be decimated; which ſeaſonable piece of ſeverity made him as much reſpected by his troops, as he had been formerly beloved.

Cuts off ten thouſand of the rebels.

He ſoon after marched in queſt of the enemy, and falling in with a body of ten thouſand rebels, who were laying waſte the country, he fell upon them, and, cutting off their retreat, put them all to the ſword. Hereupon Spartacus, after a fruitleſs attempt to get over to Sicily, poſted himſelf in a peninſula near Rhegium. There Craſſus ſhut him in with a ditch from one ſea to the other, three hundred furlongs long, fifteen foot broad, and as much in depth. But the brave Spartacus, taking the opportunity of a ſnowy ſtormy night, filled up part of the ditch, forced his way through the enemy's army, and encamped again in the open country. Craſſus was afraid leſt he ſhould march directly to Rome. But he was freed from this apprehenſion, when he ſaw a great body of the rebellious ſlaves upon ſome diſcontent revolt from Spartacus, and encamp by themſelves.

Bravery of the ſlaves.

Theſe Craſſus attacked without loſs of time, and defeated them after a long and obſti-

nate

nate diſpute. Twelve thouſand three hundred of the enemy were killed upon the ſpot, of which number only two were found wounded in the back, all the reſt died fighting in their ranks with incredible bravery. After this defeat, Spartacus retired towards the mountains of Petilia. But his men, encouraged by a ſlight advantage gained over two of Craſſus's officers, obliged him to march them back, and lead them againſt the Romans. This was what Craſſus impatiently deſired, being informed by his friends at Rome, that the people deſigned to recal him, and give the command of the army to their favourite idol Pompey. He therefore encamped near the enem, and offered them battle. As Spartacus could not retreat, being inveſted in his camp by Craſſus, he drew up his army with all the ſkill of a great commander. When his horſe was brought him before the onſet, he drew his ſword and killed him, ſaying, If I gain the victory, I ſhall have a great many better horſes; if I loſe it, I ſhall have no need of this. He then began the attack at the head of his infantry. His men, animated by his example, fought with unparallelled bravery. Victory was long doubtful, but at length declared for the Romans. Spartacus, after all his men were fled, ſtood his ground alone for a great while with invincible courage. Being wounded in the leg with a javelin, he fought on his knees, holding his buckler in one hand and his ſword in the other. At laſt, being pierced with many wounds, he fell upon an heap of Romans, whom he had ſacrificed to his fury. In this battle forty thouſand of the rebels were killed upon the ſpot, whereas the Romans loſt but a thouſand men. However, the fugitives rallied again to the number of five thouſand, and retired under the conduct of one Publipot into Lucania. Againſt theſe Pompey marched, and having defeated them without difficulty, wrote a bragging letter to the ſenate, wherein he vainly aſſumed to himſelf the glory of having finiſhed the war. Craſſus, ſaid he, has overcome the gladiators in a pitched battle; but I have plucked up war by the roots. This is the true ſpirit of ambition, which wreſts every thing, even the actions of others, to its own advantage. Craſſus was highly provoked at Pompey's vanity, which robbed him of the glory he deſerved; but nevertheleſs, as he aſpired at the conſulſhip, and was well appriſed that it was in Pompey's power to get him excluded, he diſſembled his reſentment, and even begged his rival's intereſt. Pompey, who ſtood himſelf for the ſame dignity, and had long deſired to lay ſome obligation upon Craſſus, Spartacus defeated and ſlain.

Craſſus, readily embraced this opportunity, declaring in open aſſembly, that he ſhould be as much obliged to his friends for the advancement of Craſſus as his own. Upon this declaration the tribes unanimouſly concurred in raiſing Pompey to the conſulate, and giving him Craſſus for his collegue. But this good underſtanding between the two rivals did not continue long. Pompey refuſed to diſband the troops he had brought from Spain, till a triumph was decreed him. On the other hand Craſſus, would not part with the command of the army he had led againſt Spartacus, ſo long as Pompey continued in arms. The latter gave out, that Pompey aſpired at an abſolute power, and intended to follow the example of Sylla (L), and to govern by a ſtanding army. Theſe diſcourſes greatly exaſperated Pompey; and the breach between the two collegues growing daily wider, the ſenate and people, to prevent the evil effects of their mutual jealouſies, earneſtly entreated them to diſband their armies, and ſacrifice their private reſentments to the public peace. But they both continued obſtinate; Craſſus pretending, that Pompey ought firſt to diſband his army, ſince he had firſt finiſhed the Spaniſh war; and Pompey proteſting, that he would not diſmiſs his troops, till the arrival of Metellus, who was to triumph with him. The people, dreading to ſee Rome involved again in a civil war, even went ſo far as to beg of them on their knees in the comitium to be reconciled. But neither of them hearkening to the entreaties of the people, a Roman knight, by name Ovatius Aurelius, who had ſpent ſome years of his life in the country, and was then accidentally in Rome, mounting the roſtra, gave them an account

Pompey and Craſſus conſuls.

They fall out.

(L) No-body doubted but this was his deſign; whence Cicero wrote to Atticus in the following words; Mirandum enim in modum Cneius noſter Syllani regni ſimilitudinem concupivit: εἰδως σοι λέγω, nihil ille unquam minus obſcure tulit; that is, Our friend Pompey is wonderfully deſirous of obtaining a power like that of Sylla: I tell you no more than what I know for certain; for he makes no ſecret of it (23). And elſewhere; Hoc turpe Cneius noſter biennio ante cogitavit; ita Syllaturit animus ejus & proſcripturit, that is, Pompey has been forming this ſhameful deſign for theſe two years laſt paſt; ſo ſtrongly is his mind bent upon imitating Sylla, and proſcribing like him (24).

(23) Cic. ad Attic. l. vii. epiſt. 9. (24) Idem ibid. epiſt. 10.

account of a viſion he pretended to have ſeen in his ſleep. Jupiter, ſaid he, appeared to me laſt night, and admoniſhes you, O Romans, by my mouth, not to ſuffer the miſunderſtanding between the two conſuls to continue any longer. When Ovatius had done ſpeaking, the people renewed their entreaties, and then Craſſus, moved with ſentiments of piety, made the firſt advances, drew near to Pompey, and offered him his hand. Pompey returned the civility; they embraced each other; and ſoon after they diſbanded their troops by conſent[y].

Are in appearance reconciled.

HOWEVER, as their reconciliation was not ſincere, each of them ſtrove, by different methods, to gain the favour of the people and ſtrengthen his party. Pompey baſely made his court to the multitude by reinſtating the tribunes in their antient power, which greatly contributed to the deſtruction of the common-wealth. He likewiſe engaged M. Aurelius Cotta the prætor, to move, that ſome Roman knights might be appointed to be his aſſeſſors, and to judge with him in civil cauſes. Thus the right of judging private cauſes, which had been taken from the knights by Sylla, was by means of Pompey reſtored to them; which engaged that powerful order to ſupport him in all his pretenſions with their whole intereſt. On the other hand, Craſſus, to get the better of his rival in the eſteem of the people, entertained them, though naturally covetous, with ſurprizing profuſion and magnificence at ten thouſand tables, and at the ſame time diſtributed corn enough to all the populace to maintain their families three whole months. Such prodigious largeſſes will ſeem leſs ſurpriſing, if we conſider that Craſſus was the richeſt man in Rome, and that his eſtate amounted to ſeven thouſand talents and upwards, that is, to 1356250 l. ſterling. But notwithſtanding this mighty bounty, Pompey ſtill maintained the firſt place in the affections and eſteem of the multitude[z]. This year the cenſorſhip, which had been ſuppreſſed during the civil wars, was revived, L. Gellius Poplicola and Cn. Cornelius Lentulus being promoted to that dignity. Theſe appointed Q. Catulus prince of the ſenate, ſtruck the names of ſixty-four antient ſenators out of the liſt, and made a cenſus, in which they found, that the number of Roman citizens

Pompey and Craſſus affect popularity.

[y] Plut. in Craſſ. & Pomp. Cic. pro lege Manilia. Appian. bell. civil. l. i. [z] Plut. in Craſſo. Cic. de legib. l. iii. Salluſt. in bell. Catilin.

citizens fit to bear arms amounted to four hundred and fifty thouſand.

AND now the conſulate of Pompey and Craſſus being expired, the republic raiſed to the faſces the famous orator Q. Hortenſius and Q. Metellus, the ſon of Metellus Dalmaticus. As all was calm at Rome during their adminiſtration, Pompey no longer intermeddled in public affairs, neither frequenting the bar, as he had done formerly, nor the aſſemblies of the people. He ſeldom appeared in public; and when he did, he was always attended by a great number of clients, deſigning thereby to keep up the reſpect due to him, as a man of ſuperior rank and uncommon merit. He even thought it beneath him to converſe with the generality of the nobility, and therefore kept company only with a few ſelect friends [a]. The following year the tribes raiſed L. Cæcilius Metellus and Q. Marcius, ſurnamed Rex, to the conſulate. The former died before he entered upon his office, and another, whoſe name has not been tranſmitted to us, was choſen in his room. But he alſo dying ſoon after his election, the people ſuperſtitiouſly took it for granted, that it was the pleaſure of the gods that the republic ſhould be governed one whole year by Marcius alone. During his adminiſtration, the ſenate, pretending that the Cretans had ſided with Mithridates and given a retreat to the pirates, ſent Q. Cæcilius Metellus with a fleet to reduce that iſland. But of this expedition we have given a diſtinct account in our hiſtory of Crete [b].

The iſland of Crete reduced.

IN the following conſulate of C. Calpurnius Piſo and M. Acilius Glabrio, Gabinius, tribune of the people, at the inſtigation of Pompey, who began to be weary of a retired life, propoſed a law for clearing the ſeas of the pirates, whoſe numbers and power daily encreaſed. Theſe robbers fitted out at firſt but a ſmall number of light veſſels; but upon their being protected by Mithridates, who, during his war with Rome, took them into his ſervice, they equipped a thouſand galleys, and exerciſed a kind of ſovereignty over all the coaſts of the Mediterranean. They ſpared not one temple that was famous for its riches on the coaſts of Italy, Greece, and Aſia. All the country-ſeats on the ſea-ſhore were a prey to them. They took ſlaves without number; blocked up all the ports of the republic; pillaged

The ſeas infeſted by pirates.

[a] Plut. ibid. [b] Vide Hiſt. Univerſ. Vol. vii. p. 481, & ſeq.

pillaged the city of Caieta; ſunk part of a conſular fleet at Oſtia, and having made a deſcent near Miſene, carried away the daughter of the old conſul Antonius with ſeveral other perſons of diſtinction. They even ſurpriſed and carried off two Roman prætors, Sextilius and Bellinus, in their purple robes with their lictors and attendants. If any of the captives declared himſelf to be a Roman, the barbarians in deriſion threw themſelves at his feet, begging his pardon, and imploring his protection. But after they had inſolently ſported with their priſoner, they often dreſſed him in a toga, and then, caſting out a ſhip's ladder, deſired him to return home and wiſhed him a good journey. If he refuſed to leap into the ſea, they threw him over-board, ſaying, that they would not by any means keep a free-born Roman in captivity. But the greateſt calamity the world ſuffered by theſe tyrants of the ſea was, the ſcarcity of proviſions which they occaſioned, not in Europe only, but likewiſe in Aſia and Africa, no veſſel venturing out without being taken. Gabinius therefore, who propoſed a law for clearing the ſeas of theſe pirates, was much applauded for his zeal, though in reality he had nothing in view, but the procuring of new honours for Pompey, who had reſtored the college of tribunes to their former authority. In virtue of the law which Gabinius propoſed, the perſon to whom the Roman people and ſenate ſhould commit the managment of this war, for the crafty tribune did not name Pompey, was to have a power without controul or reſtriction. His authority was to extend all over the ſeas within the Streights, or the pillars of Hercules, and over all the countries for the ſpace of four hundred furlongs from the ſea. By the ſame law he was empowered to raiſe as many mariners and ſoldiers as he thought fit, to take what ſums he pleaſed out of the public treaſury, without being accountable for them, and to chooſe out of the ſenate fifteen ſenators to be his lieutenants, and to execute his orders, where he could not be preſent in perſon. As this arbitrary and unbounded authority was to be for three years, it gave a great deal of uneaſineſs and jealouſy to the ſenate. They ſaw through the tribune's deſign, and ſeveral of them reproached Pompey with aiming at the ſovereignty of Rome; nay, the conſul Calpurnius told him ſmartly, that if he followed the footſteps of Romulus he would ſcarce avoid his end. But he was in danger of being torn in pieces by the people, for treating with ſuch freedom their favourite. The conſcript ſcript fathers, finding the people determined to paſs the law, had recourſe to their old method of diſconcerting the meaſures of the tribunes, and gained over two of them, Trebellius and Roſcius [c].

The Gabinian law.

As no body doubted but this extenſive commiſſion, which the tribune Gabinius called the proconſulate of the ſeas, was deſigned for Pompey, when the day appointed for holding the comitia came, in which the Gabinian law was to be received or rejected, the concourſe was prodigious. The tribune Trebellius attempted to oppoſe it; but the tribes threatening to depoſe him, he was forced to give way and be ſilent. Then Catulus, prince of the ſenate, riſing up, made a long ſpeech, which was nothing but a panegyric upon Pompey. In the cloſe of his harangue, he adviſed the people not to expoſe a man of his value, the greateſt general of the republic, to ſo many dangers. For if you ſhould loſe him, ſaid he, where could you find another Pompey? or whom would you put in his place? At theſe words the people, who had hearkened to the venerable ſenator with great attention, cried out with one voice, You, Catulus, we will put you in his place. Catulus, no longer able to reſiſt the firm reſolution of the whole people, and at the ſame time pleaſed with the eſteem they ſhewed for him, waved his oppoſition and withdrew. Then the tribune Roſcius attempted to ſpeak, but being prevented by the clamours of the people, he held up two of his fingers, to ſignify, that he was for dividing that extenſive commiſſion between two perſons, and not intruſting Pompey alone with ſuch an ample and unlimited authority. Upon this the aſſembly made ſuch a terrible outcry, that a crow flying accidentally over the comitium at that inſtant, was ſtunned and dropt down among the rabble [d]. Hortenſius and ſeveral other ſenators ſpoke with great eloquence, and were heard with attention; but their harangues made no impreſſion on the multitude. Cicero never opened his mouth, though ſo fine an opportunity offered of diſplaying his talents. He did not care to make either Pompey, the ſenate, or the people, his enemies. The whole day being ſpent in ſpeeches and debates, the determination was poſtponed to the next, when Gabinius's motion was agreed to by a great majority, and Pompey appointed to make war on the pirates with the title of proconſul. The people even granted him more than the tribune had deſired; for they allowed allowed him to equip five hundred ships, to raise an hundred and twenty thousand foot and five thousand horse, and to chuse out of the senate twenty, or, as Appian has it, twenty-five senators for his lieutenants. He had also two quæstors allowed him, and six thousand Attic talents paid down to him before he left Rome. Thus the people, seduced by their tribunes, were running blindly into slavery; for it was now in Pompey's power to follow the example of Sylla, and make himself absolute master of the republic [e]. Pompey's power.

The Gabinian law paſſes.

[c] Plut. in Pomp. Dio Caſs. l. lvi.

[d] Plut. ibid.

However, on this occasion he behaved with great integrity, and gained more glory than he had done by all his former exploits. He conducted the expedition with such prudence, and took such wise measures, that, instead of the three years allowed him, he quite cleared the seas in four months, after having taken or sunk, according to some, one thousand three hundred, according to others, eight hundred and forty-six of their vessels, cut ten thousand of them in pieces, and made himself master of an hundred and twenty towns or castles on the coasts, which they had seized. In this glorious expedition the proconsul set at liberty an incredible number of captives, and took above twenty thousand of the pirates prisoners, whom he sent to people the deserted cities of Cilicia, namely Mallus, Adana, Epiphania, and Soli, which latter he called from his own name Pompeiopolis [f]. He extirpates the pirates.

No sooner did the news of Pompey's victories reach Rome, than Manilius, tribune of the people, at the instigation of the proconsul's friends and agents, proposed a new law in his favour, importing, that Lucullus should be recalled from Asia, where he was waging war with Mithridates and Tigranes; that the conduct of the armies employed against those two princes should be committed to Pompey, that Cilicia, where Marcius Rex commanded, and Bithynia, which had been allotted to Acilius Glabrio, should be resigned to him; and that finally he should, at the same time, retain the same naval forces and sovereignty of the seas as before. This was appointing him absolute monarch of all the Roman dominions; for the provinces, which were exempted from his authority by the former decree, such as Phrygia, Lycaonia, Galatia, Cappadocia, Cilicia, The Manilian law.

[e] Plut. & Appian. ibid. [f] Appian & Plut. ibid. c. 31. Cic. pro lege Manilia. Vell. Patercul. l. ii.

Cilicia, Colchis, Armenia, &c. would by this new law be within the precincts of his province. This was the famous law, which from its author was ſtyled the Manilian law. When the tribune propoſed it in the comitia, it raiſed ſuch diſturbances among the nobility and the zealous republicans, as are not eaſily deſcribed. They looked upon the new law as calculated for the eſtabliſhing of tyranny; We have then got at laſt, ſaid they, a ſovereign; the republic is changed into a monarchy; the ſervices of Lucullus, the honour of Glabrio and Marcius, two zealous and worthy ſenators, are to be ſacrificed to the promotion of Pompey; Sylla never carried his tyranny ſo far, &c. They encouraged one another to uſe their utmoſt efforts in oppoſition to ſo ſcandalous a decree, and not to part with their liberty at ſo tame a rate. But notwithſtanding the reſolution they ſhewed in private, when the day came for the accepting or rejecting of the Manilian law, their hearts failed them; inſomuch, that of all the conſcript fathers, only Hortenſius and Catulus had courage enough to ſpeak againſt it. The latter eſpecially made ſurpriſing efforts to diſſuade the people from inveſting one man with ſuch an abſolute power; he reproached them with the injuſtice they were going to do Lucullus, deſcribed to them in pompous terms his glorious exploits both by ſea and land, enumerated the many evils which they had reaſon to apprehend from ſuch an unbounded authority, &c. But finding the people heard with great indifference, and grew uneaſy at, his diſcourſe, he directed his ſpeech to the ſenate, and raiſing his voice, Let us fly, ſaid he, conſcript fathers, let us fly to ſome mountain, as our fore-fathers have done; let us fly to ſome rocks, where we may ſhelter ourſelves from the ſlavery with which we are threatened. Two great men ſpoke in favour of the law, viz. Cicero and Cæſar; the former aimed at the conſulate, which Pompey's party could more eaſily procure him, than that of Catulus and the ſenate. On this occaſion he made that ſpeech, which is ſtill preſerved, and will be the admiration of all ages. As for Cæſar, he was delighted to ſee the people inſenſibly loſe that republican ſpirit and love of liberty, which might one day obſtruct the vaſt deſigns he had already formed. Thus was the public intereſt, as it too commonly happens, ſacrificed to private views. The decree paſſed by the ſuffrages of all the tribes; and the people of their own accord conferred on Pompey as extenſive an authority as Sylla had uſurped by

The cowardice of the ſenate.

Cicero and Cæſar favour Pompey.

by an armed force [f]. He was still on the coasts of Asia, when news was brought him of the extraordinary power with which the people had vested him. He received it with an affected modesty and reluctance; What! said he, will Rome then burden me with a new war? Must I never have any rest? Must I sacrifice to the desires of my country the pleasures of a retired life, and the enjoyment of a beloved wife? Happy, thrice happy are those who live in the inglorious croud, unknown and unregarded! Plutarch tells us, that even his most zealous friends were highly displeased with such gross hypocrisy, well knowing what steps he had taken in order to procure this new commission. Lucullus, seeing himself thus degraded, returned to Rome, where he was received by the nobility with all possible marks of esteem, and honoured with a most pompous and magnificent triumph. As for Pompey, he pursued the war against Mithridates and Tigranes with great success, and performed those glorious exploits in Pontus, Albania, Iberia, &c. which we have described at length in our history of Pontus [g].

Pompey's dissimulation and hypocrisy.

WHILE Pompey was extending the dominions of the republic in Asia, some wicked citizens were plotting her ruin at home. At the head of these was Lucius Sergius Catiline, who was descended of an illustrious patrician family, but had rendered himself infamous by a continued series of debaucheries, incests, murders, and the most horrible crimes. He is said to have debauched, when he was very young, a woman of distinction, and to have afterwards married the daughter he had by her. He was likewise accused of keeping an unlawful correspondence with Fabia Terentia, the vestal, sister to Terentia, Cicero's wife. He had committed murders without number, and had been, in the time of Sylla's proscriptions, the most merciless minister of that tyrant's fury. The favour of the dictator, his birth and courage, had raised him to the principal dignities of the republic. He had been quæstor, lieutenant in several armies, and had governed Africa in quality of prætor. But in all these different employments he had equally dishonoured himself by his debaucheries and enormous oppressions. As he had squandered away his patrimony, and was overloaded with debts, he had no prospect of retrieving his affairs, but by the subversion of the state.

Catiline's character.

[f] Plut. in Pomp. Dio. l. xxxvi. Liv. l. c. Vell. Patercul l. ii. c. 33. Cic. pro lege Manilia. [g] Vide Vol. ix. p. 438, & seq.

He therefore watched all opportunities of raiſing diſturbances; and one offered ſoon after his return from Africa, where he had been prætor. P. Autronius Pætus and P. Cornelius Sylla, the ſon of the dictator's brother, being choſen conſuls, and afterwards diſqualified for that office, upon their being convicted of having openly bought the ſuffrages of the people, Catiline prevailed upon them to enter into a plot againſt the conſuls who were choſen in their room, viz. Aurelius Cotta and Manlius Torquatus.

Conſpires againſt the conſuls and ſenate.

His ſcheme was to aſſaſſinate them both, murder the greateſt part of the ſenators, and ſeize the government. Beſides Autronius and Sylla, he engaged a great many young men, who were undone by their exceſſes, and, among the reſt, Cn. Calpurnius Piſo, a youth of a noble family, but raſh, factious, and by his exceſſes reduced almoſt to beggary. This wicked attempt was to be put in execution on the calends of January, when the new conſuls took poſſeſſion of their office. But the conſpirators not having found a convenient opportunity that day, they put off the affair to the nones of February, the day appointed for the uſual meeting of the conſcript fathers. But this ſecond attempt proved as unſucceſsful as the firſt. Catiline gave the ſignal at an improper time, before the conſpirators were got together; ſo that no body offered to ſtir; by which means the lives of the conſuls and ſenators were ſaved, and the moſt bloody and execrable conſpiracy, which had been formed ſince the foundation of Rome, came to nothing. However, Catiline did not drop his wicked deſign; as he had ſpent his patrimony in debauchery, and was plunged in debt, he had no reſource but in the ſubverſion of the republic [h]. But we ſhall leave him for a while to obſerve the conduct of another young Roman, who had the ſame view with Catiline of ſubverting the whole conſtitution, but took more prudent and better concerted meaſures for the execution of his deſign.

His conſpiracy defeated.

Julius Cæſar captivates the hearts of the people.

This was Julius Cæſar, who, having paſſed through the offices of legionary tribune and quæſtor, was this year raiſed to the ædileſhip, in which employment he made it his whole buſineſs to gain the affections of the people. Nothing could be more polite and engaging than his behaviour. His liberality knew no bounds, and the magnificence of his furniture and entertainments ſurpaſſed any thing that had ever before been ſeen in Rome. As he was naturally of a generous diſpoſition, he [h] Salluſt. bell. Catilin. Plut. in Cic.

he is ſaid to have owed above one thouſand three hundred talents, that is, 251875l. ſterling, before he entered upon any of the public offices. The immenſe ſums he beſtowed upon the populace gave no umbrage even to his enemies, who uſed to ſay, that this was a ſhort-lived ſhew, which would ſoon end with his eſtate, and then he would be reduced to the ſtate of a common citizen. Cicero only ſaw farther than the vulgar into the intentions of the ambitious youth. He was the firſt who had any ſuſpicion of his aſpiring at a ſovereign power, and often uſed to ſay, that in all his other actions and intrigues he plainly diſcovered the air of a tyrant; but when he ſaw his hair lie in ſo exact order, and obſerved him ſo often adjuſting it with his finger, he could not imagine it ſhould enter into ſuch a man's thoughts to ſubvert the Roman ſtate. Cicero did not diſcover that manly courage and intrepidity, which lay concealed under the appearance of luxury and effeminacy. As the office of ædile confined him to Rome, he undertook the repairing of the Appian way, and finiſhed that great work almoſt wholly at his own expence. He entertained the people with a ſhew of three hundred and twenty couple of gladiators, and built porticos of timber with ſeats all round the forum, that the populace might ſee, without any inconvenience, the Megaleſian games, which were exhibited at Rome, during his ædileſhip. By theſe means he ſo captivated the people, that they were now as much, if not more, devoted to him, than to Pompey. Depending upon the favour of the people, he made a funeral oration in praiſe of his aunt Julia, though ſhe was the widow of Marius, whoſe name was odious to the ſenate and nobility; and was even ſo bold as to bring forth on that occaſion the images of Marius, which no body had preſumed to produce ſince the government firſt came into Sylla's hands. The nobility exclaimed againſt him for reviving the memory of one who had been declared an enemy to his country; but the people applauded the action; and this encouraged him to ſet up in the night-time the ſtatues and trophies of Marius, which Sylla had ordered to be taken down. Next morning the people crouded to ſee them, and many of Marius's party even wept for joy at the ſight of his ſtatues and trophies. But the nobility inveighed bitterly againſt Cæſar, as if he had deſigns upon the government, and Catulus even accuſed him before the ſenate of aiming at the ſame tyrannical power which Marius had uſurped. He cloſed his ſpeech with this remarkable ſaying; Cæſar no longer undermines the government, but openly plants his batteries againſt it. But the accuſed anſwered the invectives of Catulus with ſo much art and temper, that he was not only acquitted, but highly applauded by the people as a relation worthy of the great Marius. Julius Cæſar being thus become the idol of the people, he prevailed upon them to confer the conſular dignity on L. Julius Cæſar, one of his own family, though of another branch. The collegue the republic gave him was C. Marcius Figulus, a man of a mild diſpoſition, and an enemy to all factions and parties. During their adminiſtration, Cæſar got many of Sylla's partiſans condemned, ſome to perpetual baniſhment, others to death, for the murders they had committed during the dictator's tyrannical reign. Among the latter was L. Bellienus, uncle to Catiline; but Catiline himſelf was ſpared, though he had been the chief inſtrument of Sylla's fury[i]. He was a friend to Cæſar, and had communicated to him, as was ſuppoſed, his wicked deſign of ſubverting the government. Of this horrible conſpiracy the antients give us the following account.

He revives the memory and honours of Marius.

Catiline his conſpiracy. Year after the flood; 2940. Before Chriſt, 59. Of Rome 689.

CATILINE, though he had failed in his two former plots, as we have related above, yet did not drop his wicked deſign of ſubverting the government, but having ſtrengthened his party with a great number of ſenators and knights, waited only for an opportunity of putting it in execution. Among his accomplices in the ſenate were P. Lentulus Sura, P. Antronius, L. Caſſius Longinus, C. Cethegus, Publius, and Servius Sylla, L. Vargunteius, Q. Annius, M. Porcius Læca, L. Beſtia, and Q. Curius; and among the knights M. Fulvius Nobilior, L. Statilius, P. Gabinius Capito, and C. Cornelius. We are told, that M. Licinius Craſſus was alſo privy to the plot, and that Cæſar favoured it underhand: theſe two cunning and equally ambitious men waited for the event before they would declare themſelves. Beſides the above-mentioned ſenators and knights, Catiline drew into the plot all the debauched youth of Rome, who had ſquandered away their eſtates, and could no longer follow their extravagant courſes; and likewiſe ſome of the old ſoldiers and officers of Sylla's army, who, after having conſumed all the rewards of their former ſervices in debaucheries, were longing for a new civil war, as the only remedy for want and poverty. As it was very difficult difficult that the deſigns of ſuch men as were continually rioting ſhould long remain ſecret, Cicero was informed of them by Fulvia, a woman of diſtinction, but who diſhonoured her family by a criminal correſpondence with Quintus Curius, one of the conſpirators. The young debauchee, finding himſelf ſcornfully treated by Fulvia, after he had ſpent his eſtate upon her, in order to recover her favour, boaſted, that he ſhould be ſoon rich enough to pleaſe her; adding, that the method he was taking to become ſo, was a ſecret which he would never diſcloſe to her. This awaked her curioſity; and as ſhe was more artful than her lover, ſhe ſoon prevailed upon him by her careſſes to unravel the whole plot. Whether Fulvia was really ſtruck with the danger of the republic, or thought the undertaking would not ſucceed, as being managed in great part by young people, ſhe made a full diſcovery of all ſhe had heard to Cicero, but concealed the name of the perſon, who had given her that intelligence. This diſcovery Cicero, who then ſtood for the conſulate, and had Catiline for his competitor, made uſe of to get himſelf choſen, and Catiline excluded. The collegue given him by the tribes was C. Antonius, a man naturally lazy, a lover of eaſe and pleaſure, and who hitherto no further concerned himſelf in public affairs, than was neceſſary to ſhew that he was not abſolutely unfit for them. As he was a man of little weight and eaſily manageable, Cicero flattered himſelf that he ſhould be able, with a little art, to get the aſcendant over him, and govern him as he pleaſed. They no ſooner entered upon their office, than P. Servilius Rullus, tribune of the people, endeavoured to revive the old troubles about the diſtribution of the conquered lands. But he was vigorouſly oppoſed by Cicero, who by the force of his eloquence prevailed upon the people to ſacrifice their private intereſt to the public tranquillity. The cauſe of the public diſturbances being removed, the new conſul applied himſelf next to draw off his collegue from the faction of the tribunes, which he favoured; and ſucceeded by changing provinces with him, and reſigning to him the government of Macedon, which by lot was fallen to himſelf, and taking that of Gaul, which was leſs profitable, and had fallen to Antonius. This done, he made it his chief buſineſs to prevent any popular diſturbance. One had like to have been raiſed in the theatre, on account of the new diſtinction which the tribune Otho had given to the Roman knights, allotting to them, in all

[i] Plut. in Cæſar. Salluſt. bell. Catilin.

The conſpiracy diſcovered to Cicero.

Cicero's conſulſhip.

public ſhews, the fourteen firſt ranks after thoſe of the ſenators. But Cicero interpoſed, and harangued the people with ſuch ſtrength and ſucceſs, that they willingly complied with Otho's regulation. By this means he ſtifled a ſedition in its birth, of which Catiline might have made a very ill uſe [k].

Preparations made by Catiline for an open revolt.

In the mean time, Catiline, grown outrageous at Cicero's ſucceſs, reſolved to ſtand once more for the conſulate, and prepared for an open rebellion, in caſe he ſhould not ſucceed. He borrowed what money he could; and engaged his partiſans to raiſe as much as poſſible upon their credit, and on ſecurities. Theſe ſums were lodged in the hands of one Manlius, a ſoldier of fortune, who had ſerved with great reputation of bravery under Sylla, and at that time reſided at Fæſulæ in Hetruria. As that city was a colony of Sylla's ſoldiers, Manlius who had great intereſt among them, engaged them in the plot, and made conſiderable levies throughout all Hetruria. Lucullus the famous general, whom Pompey had ſucceeded in the eaſt, being informed of theſe preparations, made a report of what he had heard to the ſenate, and aſſiſted the conſul with all his intereſt in the proſecution of the traitor. Cicero at the ſame time kept up a ſtrict correſpondence with Fulvia, and even gained over ſome of the conſpirators, who, purſuant to his directions, pretended to be the warmeſt promoters of the plot. It was by their means that he diſcovered the deſigns of Catiline, the various ſentiments of his accomplices, their number and quality, and the general, as well as the private, views of each of the conſpirators. By them he was informed, that on a day appointed the conſpirators were to ſet fire to ſeveral parts of the city; that during the confuſion and uproar, which ſo general a conflagration would occaſion, ſome were to murder the chief men of the ſenate in their houſes, others to aſſemble the mutinous populace, ſeize the capitol, and fortify themſelves there, till Manlius arrived from Hetruria with his veterans. Two Roman knights were appointed to murder Cicero in his own houſe; but the conſul immediately informed of all that paſſed in their aſſembly, ſummoned the ſenate, and boldly informed the fathers, in Catiline's preſence, of the danger they were in. He communicated to them the whole plot, and though he did not not think proper to name thoſe, by whom he had been informed, yet the ſenate by a public decree ordered the conſuls to take care that the republic ſuffered no detriment; an antient form, by which the magiſtrates for the time being had almoſt an unbounded authority conferred on them. Cicero, inveſted with ſuch an ample power, diſpatched, without delay, ſome of the worthieſt ſenators to the principal cities in Italy to keep them in awe. At the ſame time he placed guards in different parts of Rome to prevent the incendiaries. By his advice the ſenate promiſed not only a pardon, but ample rewards, to any of the conſpirators, who ſhould make farther diſcoveries of this black attempt. But not one ſingle man, which is very ſurpriſing, out of ſo great a number of profligates, appeared as an evidence againſt his accomplices. The conſul might indeed, upon his own perſonal knowledge, have made uſe of the new power the ſenate had given him, and condemned Catiline and his adherents to death without appeal. But as this was a dangerous ſtep, he thought it more adviſeable to induce Catiline to leave Rome, and to take refuge in Manlius's camp near Fæſulæ. With this view he aſſembled the conſcript fathers, and Catiline appearing among the reſt, as if he had been no ways concerned in the affair, thoſe ſenators, near whom he came to ſeat himſelf, quitting their places, left him quite by himſelf. Then Cicero, no longer able to conceal his indignation, firſt read certain letters which had been put into his hand by Licinius Craſſus (M); and then directing his ſpeech to Catiline, made that famous oration, which is ſtill extant, and will ever be admired by all men of taſte and judgment. Catiline heard his ſpeech with the moſt artful diſſimulation, and even had the aſſurance to entreat the conſcript fathers not to ſuffer themſelves to be prejudiced againſt him by the calumnies of his moſt bitter

[k] Plut. in Cic, in Rull. & Piſon.

The conſuls are veſted with an extraordinary power.

Cicero harangues the people againſt Catiline.

(M) After Craſſus had ſupped, one of his ſervants brought him a pacquet, which he ſaid had been delivered to him by an unknown perſon. In the pacquet were ſeveral letters directed to different perſons, and one to Craſſus himſelf, which he read; and found therein the whole ſcheme of the conſpiracy. The anonymous writer likewiſe adviſed him to leave Rome without delay, if he tendered his life. Upon this Craſſus went directly to the conſul, and delivered to him the pacquet, in order to clear himſelf of the ſuſpicion, which his ſtrict friendſhip with Catiline had raiſed.

bitter enemy, a new man, who had not ſo much as an houſe of his own, and who had forged a conſpiracy in order to raiſe himſelf, and acquire the title of defender of his country. He added, that Cicero laughed in private at their credulity, and the falſe alarms he had given them. But when he began to proceed to invectives againſt the conſul, he was interrupted by the cries of the whole aſſembly, the ſenate-houſe ringing with the names of incendiary, parricide, enemy to his country, &c. Catiline, highly provoked at theſe reproaches, and foaming with rage, cried out, Since you have provoked me to the utmoſt, I will not periſh alone, but will have the ſatisfaction of involving thoſe who have ſworn my ruin, in the ſame deſtruction with myſelf. Having ſpoke thus, he inſtantly left the ſenate, and ſending for Cethegus, Lentulus, and the other chief conſpirators, he gave them an account of what had juſt happened in the ſenate; made them ſenſible, that he could no longer ſtay in Rome with ſafety; encouraged them to lay hold of the firſt opportunity of ſetting fire to the city, of aſſaſſinating the ſenators, and above all of deſtroying the conſul, the only man who could render their deſigns abortive. He told them, that he was going to put himſelf at the head of the forces, which Manlius had raiſed for him in Hetruria, and that they ſhould ſoon ſee him again with ſuch a force, as would ſtrike the boldeſt of his enemies with dread and terror. After this conference he ſet out in great haſte for Hetruria, attended by three hundred of his party. His ſudden flight gave Cicero great pleaſure; but as he was ſenſible how tender the people were of their privileges, and feared the tribunes might exaſperate the populace againſt him, by ſuggeſting, that he had baniſhed a Roman citizen without conſulting them, the next day he mounted the roſtra, and in his ſecond oration againſt Catiline, which is ſtill preſerved in his works, informed the aſſembly of the true ſtate of affairs, aſſuring them, with great firmneſs, that no care or vigilance ſhould be wanting, on his part, to guard them againſt the impending dangers [1].

Catiline leaves Rome.

In the mean time Catiline arriving at Manlius's camp in the neighbourhood of Fæſulæ, took upon him the command of the troops, and at the ſame time aſſumed all the marks of a ſupreme magiſtrate, being preceded by lictors carrying their axes and faſces. The ſenate informed of [1] Plut. in Cic. Salluſt. ibid.

of so open a rebellion; declared Catiline and Manlius enemies to their country, and at the same time ordered the consul Antonius to take the field with a proconsular army, and Cicero to continue in Rome and there watch the motions of the conspirators. At the motion of Cicero a decree was also passed, promising impunity to all those who should abandon Catiline, and return to Rome within a limited time, and declaring those guilty of high treason against the state, who should join him. Notwithstanding this decree, great numbers of profligates flocked to him both from Rome, and the other cities of Italy. Among others the son of Aulus Fulvius, a venerable senator, set out for the army of the rebels; but his father dispatched messengers after him, who brought him back to Rome; where his father, in virtue of his paternal authority, condemned him to death, and caused his severe sentence to be immediately put in execution. In the mean time Lentulus and the other chiefs of the conspiracy endeavoured to draw into the plot the embassadors of the Allobroges then at Rome, in order to get assistance from Transalpine Gaul. But the embassadors imparted the whole affair to Q. Fabius Sanga, who was the protector of their nation, according to the custom of those times, when the different states subject to the republic had in the senate one who took care of their interests. Sanga, after having made them sensible of the danger of such an undertaking, brought them to the consul, who prevailed upon them to continue their negotiations with the conspirators, in order to procure by their means undeniable proofs of the conspiracy. Accordingly, the embassadors made no difficulty to close with the propofals of the conspirators, but insisted on a written treaty as their credentials to their countrymen. This treaty was granted them, signed by all the chiefs of the plot; and it was agreed, that they should set out on the third of the nones of December, and take their way through Hetruria to get the treaty ratified by Catiline. Cicero, being informed by the embassadors when they were to leave Rome, sent privately two prætors, with a sufficient number of troops, to lie in wait for them, seize them, with the conspirators who attended them, and bring them all back to Rome. The prætors faithfully executed their commission; the embassadors together with Vulturcius, who had taken upon him to conduct them to Catiline, were stopped at the bridge Milvius, and brought back to Catiline declared an enemy to his country.

Is betrayed by the embassadors of the Allobroges.

Rome

Rome with all the papers, which either the Allobroges or Vulturcius had in their cuſtody. This news Cicero received by break of day, and having now in his power undeniable proofs of the conſpiracy, he ſent, without loſs of time, proper officers to ſeize Lentulus, Gabinius, Cethegus, Statilius, and other chiefs of the conſpiracy, in their houſes. Theſe were not ſent to the public priſons, but, agreeable to the tenderneſs the Roman laws ſhewed to citizens, though ſuſpected of the greateſt crimes, were only committed to the care of ſome of the moſt illuſtrious ſenators. Then the conſul, upon the depoſition of the Allobroges, ordered the houſe of Cethegus to be ſearched; and having found there a great quantity of ſulphur and tow, with arms of all ſorts, he aſſembled the ſenate in the temple of Concord. There he produced his evidence, confronted the witneſſes with the criminals, and prevailed on Vulturcius to diſcover the ſecrets of the plot. Cicero, having thus got the proofs he expected both from the witneſſes and criminals, he aſſembled the ſenate again, when the conſcript fathers returned him the thanks he deſerved, and acknowledged, that by his wiſdom, vigilance, and courage, he had diſcovered a deteſtable plot, ſaved Rome from the flames, and preſerved the republic from utter ruin. Catulus and Cato went ſo far as to ſtyle him the father of his country, an appellation, which had never been given to any Roman before him. L. Gellius moved that a civic crown ſhould be given the conſul, a mark of honour which had never been granted but in camps. After theſe applauſes the conſcript fathers entered into a debate concerning the puniſhment of the criminals; but before they came to any reſolution, L. Tarquinius, one of the conſpirators, appeared before the fathers, confeſſed his guilt, and accuſed M. Licinius Craſſus, the richeſt man in Rome, of being concerned in the conſpiracy. But the very name of Craſſus raiſed a great clamour in the aſſembly; his friends cried out, that Tarquinius had been ſuborned; and thoſe very ſenators, who ſuſpected Craſſus, joined the majority in acquitting him. It was dangerous to provoke a man of his great intereſt; ſo that Tarquinius was the only ſufferer by his accuſation. He was condemned to impriſonment, and enjoined never to mention this affair again, unleſs it were to diſcover the perſon who had ſuborned him. The ſenate, after long and warm debates, came to no other reſolution, than that the four chief criminals, Lentulus, Cethegus,

The chiefs of the conſpiracy ſeized.

Cicero ſtyled father of his country.

Craſſus accuſed and acquitted.

thegus, Statilius, and Gabinius ſhould be carried to the public priſon, and there kept under cloſe confinement, till the fathers agreed about the puniſhment that ſhould be inflicted upon them. During theſe delays, Cethegus found means to convey letters to his friends and clients, encouraging them to raiſe the whole party, and try their utmoſt to reſcue them out of priſon. But Cicero, informed of this, poſted troops on the ramparts, at the gates, and in the croſs-ways, and having aſſembled the ſenate anew on the nones of December, he exhorted the fathers to come to an ultimate reſolution concerning the priſoners. Syllanus, conſul elect for the enſuing year, was, according to cuſtom, aſked his advice firſt; and he, without heſitation, declared, that, in his opinion, they all deſerved to die. All who voted after him were of the ſame opinion, except T. Nero and Julius Cæſar. The latter made a famous ſpeech in praiſe of clemency, which is ſtill extant, and by all admired as a moſt artful piece of oratory. He concluded, ſaying, that in an affair, which concerned the lives of the citizens and the principal patricians in Rome, it was adviſeable not to be too haſty in giving judgment; but that they ſhould be well guarded, and kept in ſome towns of Italy, till Catiline was vanquiſhed. As Cæſar was an excellent orator, his ſpeech made a great impreſſion on the aſſembly. Moſt of the ſenators, and among the reſt Syllanus, retracting what he had ſaid, declared for Cæſar's opinion. But Cato, when it came to his turn to vote, repreſented in ſuch lively colours the horrible deſigns of the conſpirators, and ſhewed with ſo many unanſwerable arguments, that Cæſar's clemency was incompatible with the ſafety of the ſtate, that the whole ſenate returned to their former opinion, and ſentence of death was pronounced againſt the conſpirators, without any oppoſition but from Cæſar only, who, obſtinately perſiſting in his opinion, made ſuch a noiſe, that the guards at the door came into the ſenate, and, thinking him a conſpirator, would have killed him, had they not been prevented by Cicero and Curio (N). Cæſar's unſeaſonable

The ſenate conſults about puniſhing the conſpirators.

(N) There happened a ridiculous adventure during the heat of the conteſt between Cato and Cæſar. Servilia, Cato's ſiſter, being in love with Cæſar, ſent a ſlave to him with a letter, in which ſhe expreſſed her affection in the moſt paſſionate terms. The ſlave, who was ordered to deliver the letter into Cæſar's own hands, not finding him at home, brought it to him in the ſenate. Cato no ſooner ſaw the letter delivered, than he cried out, that it came from Cæſar ſuſpected.

ſonable mildneſs, and management in this whole affair, made moſt of the ſenators ſuſpect he had a hand in the plot; nay, Curius undertook to prove from ſome writings of Catiline, that he had entered into engagements with the author of the conſpiracy. But Cicero, who was ſenſible how great his intereſt was in Rome, avoided impeaching him with the reſt, leſt by the aſſiſtance of his friends and relations he ſhould not only eſcape the rigour of the law himſelf, but ſhould likewiſe ſave the reſt of the criminals. As Cæſar was going out of the ſenate, the knights, who were upon duty, turned the points of their naked ſwords towards him, watching the conſul's looks to receive his orders. But Cicero made them a ſign to let him eſcape, either for fear of the people, or becauſe he thought the murder illegal [m].

But ſaved by Cicero.

The conſpirators executed.

As ſoon as the decree for the execution of the criminals was paſſed, Cicero, though it was late in the day, went directly from the aſſembly to the priſon, and to prevent a reſcue in the night, had them executed in his ſight. As he was returning home after the execution, he turned to the populace, who crouded about him, and cried out, Vixerunt, They have lived, an expreſſion then in uſe among the Romans to avoid ſaying, Mortui ſunt, They are dead, death and dead being words of an ill augury, which conveyed melancholy thoughts to the mind. The friends and relations of the conſpirators, who had reſolved to break open the priſons in the night and reſcue them, were thunderſtruck, when they heard they were executed, loſt all hopes, and immediately diſperſed. It is impoſſible to expreſs the joy which the people ſhewed, when they heard that the plot was ſuppreſſed, and the conſpirators puniſhed. They conducted the conſul to his houſe with extraordinary ſhouts and acclamations: as it was night, fires were made in the ſtreets, through which he paſſed; and the whole city was illuminated, men, women, and even from one of the conſpirators, and inſiſted upon its being read to the aſſembly. Cæſar ſmiling, gave him the letter, and Cato, after he had peruſed it, threw it back to him, ſaying with his uſual ſourneſs, Take it, drunkard (25). This reproach Cæſar well deſerved, for in his youth he was greatly given to drinking.

[m] Salluſt. ibid. Plut. in Cic. & Cæſare.

(25) Plut. in Cat.

en children calling him, as he paſſed by, The deliverer Rome, the ſecond founder of the city, the father of his untry, &c. This night was more glorious to him, than a y of triumph had ever been to the greateſt general. No nful ever ſince the birth of the republic had done her more nportant ſervices. Others had enlarged her territories by eir victories, but Cicero ſaved the lives of his fellow-cizens, and the ſtate itſelf from utter ruin [n].

CICERO and Antonius had no ſooner yielded the faſces o D. Junius Syllanus and L. Licinius Murena, than Q. Metellus, and L. Beſtia, two tribunes of the people, to ob Cicero of the honour of putting an end to the rebellion, nade a motion for recalling Pompey from Aſia to march gainſt Catiline. Cæſar, jealous of Cicero's glory and growng intereſt, ſupported the tribunes; but Cato, with great intrepidity, oppoſed the motion; whereupon the two tribunes and Cæſar raiſed ſuch a tumult, that he was even driven from the roſtra by violence, and narrowly eſcaped with his life. However, the tumult was no ſooner appeaſed, than the people returned in crouds to the comitium, ſupported Cato, and prevented Metellus from publiſhing the edict. When the ſenate were informed of theſe violences, they deprived both the tribunes and Cæſar, who was then prætor, of their offices. Metellus left Rome, and ſet out for Aſia to complain to Pompey of the ſmall concern the Roman people ſhewed for his glory; but Pompey paid little regard to his complaints. As for Cæſar, he at firſt refuſed to comply with the decree of the ſenate; but at length, fearing the reſentment of the fathers, he laid down his office, and ſhut himſelf up in his houſe. The multitude, who adored him, offered to reſtore him to his poſt; but he wiſely refuſed it, without the conſent of the ſenate. This conduct charmed the fathers to ſuch a degree, that, after many encomiums, they re-inſtated him in his prætorſhip. Thus, by the departure of Metellus, and the political moderation of Cæſar, tranquillity was reſtored to the city.

Diſturbance raiſed by Cæſar and the tribunes.

DURING theſe tranſactions at Rome, Catiline made it his whole buſineſs to lead his army into Tranſalpine Gaul, where the whole nation ſeemed ready to declare for him. To prevent this, Q. Metellus Celer, leaving Picenum, which he had guarded the laſt year, poſted himſelf with three legions at the foot of the Alps. On the other hand, Antonius, [n] Plut. in Cic.

Antonius, Cicero's late collegue, kept following Catiline in the rear; so that the rebels were in a manner hemmed in by two bodies of troops. In this situation Catiline resolved to attack Antonius, who, as he had been formerly of his faction, seemed to act but faintly against him. With this view he marched back, and meeting the proconsul near the city of Pistoria, now Pistoia, he drew up his men in order of battle. In the first line he posted eight cohorts, which were the best armed; in the second the veterans, who had served under Sylla, and in the third his new levies, armed only with knotty clubs, long poles, or the implements of husbandry. Having drawn up his troops, he led them to a great distance from his camp to shew that he was fully resolved to give battle. Antonius observed the enemy's motions, but would not stir out of his camp, though all the officers of the army pressed him not to let slip the opportunity that offered of putting an end to the rebellion at once. Should Catiline escape, said they, and get into Gaul, what will be the fate of Italy? Who knows how much blood must be spilt before the rebels are crushed? But Antonius would not by any means consent to an engagement; which some historians ascribe to a secret inclination he had for the party, which he was ordered to destroy. Whatever were his motives, when the legionaries absolutely insisted on their being led against the enemy, he pretended to be indisposed, and committed the conduct of his army to Petreius, who had served above thirty years, and had raised himself by his merit from a private soldier to the post of lieutenant-general, in which quality he now served under Antonius. The soldiers, not doubting of victory under so brave and experienced a leader, marched out of their camp in two lines, and fell upon the enemy with a fury hardly to be expressed. The rebels sustained the onset with equal intrepidity and resolution, and, being encouraged by the example of their leader, obliged Petreius's first line to give ground. But that brave commander flying to their relief with a body of fresh men, the rebels were in their turn forced to retire in disorder. Hereupon Catiline, reproaching his men with cowardice, and putting them in mind of the promise they had made before the battle, either to conquer or die, brought them back to the charge, and renewed the fight with such vigour, that the victory continued doubtful, till Manlius and the officer of Fæsulæ, who commanded the wings, were both killed. Then Catiline, being no longer able to govern so great a body himself, his ranks

Catiline resolves to give Antonius battle.

Antonius commits the command of the army to Petreius.

ranks were broken, and moſt of his men, eſpecially in the wings, diſperſed. Hereupon the head of the rebels, reſolving not to outlive the ruin of his party, threw himſelf in a great rage into the midſt of the enemy, and there found the death which he ſought. He no ſooner fell, than his whole army betook themſelves to flight, leaving Petreius maſter of the field. That prudent commander would not ſuffer his men to purſue the fugitives, but allowed them all, as they were for the moſt part Roman citizens, to eſcape and return to their own houſes. Of the rebels three thouſand were killed on the ſpot. Catiline was found on a heap of dead bodies, ſtill breathing, and with thoſe marks of fierceneſs in his countenance, notwithſtanding the agonies of death, which had rendered him formidable to his enemies during his life [o]. And now nothing more ſeemed wanting with regard to the conſpiracy, than to puniſh Catiline's accomplices. L. Vettius, a Roman knight, became their accuſer, and included Cæſar, now prætor, in the number. Q. Curius likewiſe accuſed him in the ſenate of being one of the chief conſpirators, and in proof of his depoſition quoted the teſtimony of Catiline himſelf, by whom he ſaid he had been told the names of all the conſpirators, and particularly that of Cæſar. As for Vettius, he offered to produce the accuſed's own hand-writing, which had been found among Catiline's papers. But Cæſar called upon Cicero to witneſs the diſcoveries he had made to him concerning the plot; and Cicero's teſtimony was his juſtification; not that the orator thought him clear from all guilt, but becauſe he was afraid to rank ſo popular a man among the criminals [p]. After this ſeveral decrees were iſſued out againſt the reſt of the conſpirators, and ſuch effectual care was taken of the public peace, that in all the provinces, where any ſeditions had happened, the rebels were ſuppreſſed, and the guilty puniſhed.

Catiline defeated and killed.

Cæſar privy to the conſpiracy.

In the mean time the pontifex maximus dying, Cæſar was by the ſuffrages of the people advanced to that high ſtation, though he had Servilius Iſauricus and Lutatius Catulus, two of the greateſt men of the republic, for his competitors. But the joy he felt on this occaſion was in great meaſure allayed by his domeſtic misfortunes. His wife Pompeia, the daughter of Pompeius Rufus, entertained Cæſar choſen pontifex maximus.

[o] Salluſt, ibid.

[p] Plut. in Cic.

ed a ſtrong inclination for a young patrician, named P. Clodius. As Clodius, though yet a youth, was infamous for his lewdneſs and debaucheries, Pompeia could not, without expoſing her character, even ſpeak to him in public. At home ſhe was naturally watched by the virtuous Aurelia, Cæſar's mother, and by his ſiſter Julia, who entertained ſome ſuſpicions of her. As ſhe could therefore find no other opportunity of meeting Clodius, ſhe took advantage of a very ſolemn feaſt, which was to be celebrated in her huſband's houſe. It had been cuſtomary, ever ſince the birth of the republic, to have certain religious ceremonies performed at the end of every conſular year in the houſe of the conſul or prætor. Thither the veſtals repaired, and offered a ſacrifice to the Good Goddeſs (O), whoſe very name

P. Clodius carries on an intrigue with Cæſar's wife.

(O) We learn from Cicero all that is to be known of the Good Goddeſs, and of the ſacrifices offered to her. In his oration concerning the anſwers of the aruſpices, he ſpeaks thus; "What "ſacrifice is there ſo antient as that which has been handed "down to us from our firſt kings, and is coeval with Rome her-"ſelf? What ſacrifice is there ſo private and ſecret as that which "is concealed not only from the eyes of the curious and inqui-"ſitive, but from the ſight of all men, and whither neither the "moſt profligate wickedneſs nor impudence ever yet preſumed to "enter? This ſacrifice no man, except Clodius, was ever ſo im-"pious as to violate, no man, but Clodius, ever thought, without "the utmoſt horror, of aſſiſting at it. This ſacrifice, which is "performed by the veſtal virgins, which is performed for the "proſperity of the Roman people, which is performed in the "houſe of the chief magiſtrate, celebrated with unknown cere-"monies, and in honour of a goddeſs, whoſe very name to know "is ſacrilege; this ſacrifice Clodius profaned, &c." Since then, at the very time when this adventure happened, the ceremonies obſerved in that ſacrifice were abſolutely unknown to the people, and locked up under ſo religious a ſecrecy, that all were ignorant of the very name of the goddeſs, we are not to wonder, that the antients have left us in the dark as to the nature of this ſacrifice. One thing indeed ſeems unaccountable: Cicero tells us, that the name of the goddeſs was concealed from the men, but revealed to the women: how then could it remain ſuch a ſecret? This is much to the honour of the Roman women. Plutarch takes the good goddeſs to be the ſame with the Gynæcea of the Greeks, that is, with the goddeſs of the women; and adds, that the Phrygians who claimed a particular title to her, ſaid ſhe was mother to Midas, that the Romans pretended, ſhe was one of the dryads and married to Faunus, and that the Greeks affirmed, ſhe was mother to Bacchus.

name was concealed from the men, and known only to the women. At this ſacrifice it was unlawful for any man to aſſiſt; nay it was deemed a ſacrilege even for the maſter of the houſe, or his children, to be at home while the ceremony was performing. Some writers tell us, that the women, who aſſiſted at the ceremony, carried their ſuperſtition ſo far as even to cover the pictures of men and male-animals with thick veils. On this ſolemn day, and in the houſe ſet apart for this religious uſe, Clodius and Pompeia agreed to meet. Clodius, in order to get admiſſion, was to come in the habit and diſguiſe of a ſinging woman; for the ſolemnity was attended with dancing and muſic. A female ſlave, who was in the ſecret, had orders to receive him and conduct him to his miſtreſs's apartment. Clodius, being yet very young, was by his face and appearance, taken for a woman and readily admitted. The maid, who was in the ſecret, no ſooner ſaw him than ſhe ran to inform Pompeia; but as ſhe did not return ſo ſoon as Clodius expected, he grew uneaſy; and not thinking it ſafe to continue long in the ſame place, he took ſeveral turns in the rooms avoiding the lights as much as poſſible for fear of being diſcovered. As he was thus walking about ſlowly by himſelf, one of Aurelia's maids, taking him for a female muſician, aſked him to ſing; which he refuſing to do, the maid put ſeveral queſtions to him, and obliged him at laſt to ſpeak, which he no ſooner did, than his voice betrayed him. Whereupon the woman ſhrieking ran into the rooms where the ceremonies were performed, crying aloud, that ſhe had diſcovered a man. The women all in a fright threw a veil over the myſteries, ſtopt the ceremonies, and, having ordered the doors to be ſhut, ran about with lights in ſearch of the ſacrilegious man, whom they found in the maid's room, who was privy to the appointment. There they ſeized him, and having driven him out of doors, though it was yet night, they went home to acquaint their huſband's with what had happened. The next morning Clodius's impious attempt was the ſubject of every converſation, and all agreed, that he ought to be puniſhed with the utmoſt ſeverity. Accordingly he was accuſed of profaning the holy rites, but the populace declared in his favour; ſo that the judges, fearing to provoke the multitude, acquitted him. Cæſar immediately divorced Pompeia; but being ſummoned as a witneſs againſt Clodius, he ſaid, that he had nothing to charge him with. As this looked like a paradox, the accuſers aſked him, why then had he parted with his wife? Becauſe, ſaid he, I cannot bear that my wife ſhould be ſo much as ſuſpected. He declined appearing againſt Clodius, to gratify the populace, who, he ſaw, were very earneſt to ſave him [q].

Cæſar divorces his wife Pompeia.

THE next year M. Pupius Piſo, one of Pompey's lieutenants, was, upon his recommendation, raiſed to the conſulate, and with him M. Valerius Meſſala. Soon after their election, news was brought, that Pompey, after having reduced ſeveral kingdoms in the eaſt, was preparing to return to Rome. Some, fearing he ſhould turn his victorious arms againſt his country, were for raiſing troops, and guarding againſt any attempt of that nature; but he reſolved on a conduct very different from what was dreaded. He was very deſirous of making himſelf abſolute in the republic; but at the ſame time ſo weak as to imagine, that he could attain and preſerve a kind of arbitrary power by ſuch gentle methods, as would carry no odium with them.

Pompey's idle ſcheme of power.

Agreeable to this falſe notion, he diſbanded his troops, as ſoon as he landed at Brunduſium, and proceeded to Rome with as ſmall a train as if he had been returning from a journey of pleaſure. The whole city went out to meet him, and received him with loud acclamations. He demanded a triumph, which, as he well deſerved it, was readily granted him. The proceſſion laſted two days, and was by far the moſt magnificent that had ever been ſeen in Rome. Before his chariot marched three hundred and twenty-four captives of great diſtinction, among whom were Ariſtobulus king of Judæa and his ſon Antigonus; Olthaces king of Colchis; Tigranes, the ſon of Tigranes king of Armenia, with his wife and daughter; five ſons and two daughters of Mithridates king of Pontus, a queen of Scythia, &c. The ſpoils that were carried before him were valued above three millions ſterling; and the gold and ſilver coin, which he delivered to the quæſtors, amounted to thrice that ſum, not reckoning the large donatives which he beſtowed on his ſoldiers; for he ordered one thouſand five hundred drachmas to each ſoldier of his army, that is, near fifty pounds ſterling, and rewarded all the officers in proportion. He did not put any of the captives to death, as other generals uſed to do, neither did he keep them in priſon; but ſent them all, except Ariſtobulus and Tigranes, back to their reſpective countries, at the expence of

His triumph.

[q] Plut. in Cæſare.

of the public [r]. The ſolemnity was no ſooner over, than Pompey betook himſelf to a private life, declining, from a pretended modeſty, even the uſe of thoſe titles and privileges with which he had been honoured. His aim was to aſſume a ſovereign authority in the ſtate, without appearing to deſire it; but he ſoon found, that it was eaſier to give law to ſubalterns in a camp, than to govern his equals in a free ſtate without force. There were many, who made as great a figure in Rome as himſelf, and were ready to oppoſe the ſovereignty at which he aſpired. Lucullus, who had paved the way for his conqueſts in the eaſt, did not think himſelf at all inferior to this celebrated conqueror. Craſſus had been Pompey's rival ever ſince he robbed him of the honour of a triumph, by aſſuming to himſelf the glory of having put an end to the war with the ſlaves, as we have related above. Pompey indeed outſhined Craſſus in glory; but the immenſe riches of the latter put him at leaſt upon a level with his adverſary; for he is ſaid to have been worth ſeven thouſand talents, that is one million three hundred fifty-ſix thouand two hundred and fifty pounds ſterling. Cato was too zealous for the public good to let Pompey give any wound to the liberty of his country. Cicero was not ſo diſintereſted in his views as Cato; but was at bottom a good republican, and his eloquence made him formidable. Cæſar, who, we may ſay, was at this time only beginning to ſhew himſelf, was too ambitious to ſubmit to any ſuperior. However, Pompey had intereſt enough to get L. Afranius and Q. Metellus, who had ſerved under him, promoted to the conſulate. They no ſooner entered upon their office, than he made two attempts, which turned both to his confuſion, viz. that lands ſhould be given to his veterans, and that all his acts in the eaſt ſhould be approved by one decree. He made the motion himſelf; but it was almoſt unanimouſly rejected by the fathers, and no body oppoſed it with more warmth than the conſul Metellus, who had indeed made his court to Pompey, in order to raiſe himſelf, but hated him in his heart, for having divorced his ſiſter Mucia (P), which

Is convinced of the folly of his ſcheme

[r] Plut. in Pomp. Appian. in Mithridatic. Dio, l. xxxvii. Plin. l. vii. c. 26. & l. xxxvii. c. 3.

(P) Mucia was the third daughter of Q. Mucius Scævola. While her huſband was making war in Aſia, ſhe took advantage of his abſence, and carried on an intrigue with Cæſar, which was the which he looked upon as an affront offered to the Cæcilian family. As for the other conſul, he was a man of no weight, and entirely incapable of buſineſs. Pompey, enraged at the refuſal of the ſenate, had recourſe to the tribunes, and prevailed upon Flavius Nepos, one of that college, to propoſe his requeſt to the people; but Lucullus, Cato, and Metellus oppoſed the tribune with great ſteadineſs and reſolution. Their oppoſition occaſioned a tumult in the forum, and the furious tribune went ſo far as to ſend the conſul Metellus to priſon; but Pompey, who was the author of the tumult, not caring to incur the hatred of the ſenate, ordered the conſul to be ſet at liberty, under pretence that the conſul had deſired it. He was now fully convinced, that to pretend to reign in a republic, otherwiſe than by force of arms, was a chimerical project; but as he could not conquer his boundleſs ambition, he made it his whole buſineſs to gain over to his intereſt the ſeditious Clodius, a man of a moſt abandoned character, but greatly favoured by the populace, and a declared enemy to the ſenate. The illuſtrious conqueror of the eaſt demeaned himſelf ſo far as to join this profligate patrician, and to uſe his utmoſt endeavours to get him raiſed to the tribuneſhip, tho' he knew, that Clodius's only aim in aſpiring to that office was to revenge himſelf on Cicero, who had appeared as a witneſs againſt him, when he was accuſed of having profaned the myſteries of the Good Goddeſs. Hence the bitter complaints which Cicero made of him in ſeveral of his letters. This conduct greatly leſſened the high opinion, which both the people and the nobility had entertained of him before his return [s].

Sinks in his reputation.

In

[s] Plut. ibid. Cic in epiſt. 13. l. i. ad Atticum, & alibi paſſ.

the common talk of Rome; inſomuch, that Pompey did not think proper to wait till he returned to Rome to divorce her; but ſent orders to her to leave his houſe before he returned to Italy. She was ſiſter to the two Metelli, Celer and Nepos; and he could not but foreſee, that he ſhould incur the diſpleaſure of thoſe two patricians, who made a conſiderable figure in the republic; but her life was ſo ſcandalous, that Pompey thought himſelf obliged in honour to part with her, though he had three children by her. He never forgot the injury Cæſar had done him, but complained ſeveral times, in the heat of the civil wars, that the debaucher of Mucia was his Ægyſthus, ſince he was not content with having diſhonoured him, but at the ſame time wanted to take away his life, as Ægyſthus was Clytemneſtra's lover, and the muderer of her huſband Agamemnon.

In the mean time the government of Farther Spain, which comprehended Luſitania and Bœtica, that is Portugal and Andaluſia, falling by lot to Cæſar, after his prætorſhip, he was preparing to ſet out for his new province; but being ſtopped by ſome of his creditors, Craſſus, to whom he applied, took upon him to ſatisfy thoſe creditors, who would be put off no longer, and became his ſecurity for eight hundred and thirty talents, that is, one hundred ſixty thouſand eight hundred and twelve pounds ſterling. Upon this Cæſar, being at liberty to go to his government, ſet out without delay. In his journey, as he was croſſing the Alps, he paſſed by a ſmall village, which had but few inhabitants, and thoſe wretchedly poor, which gave occaſion to ſome of his friends to aſk him by way of raillery, Whether there was any canvaſſing there for offices, or any contention among the barbarians who ſhould be uppermoſt? To this queſtion Cæſar anſwered very ſeriouſly, That he had rather be firſt man among thoſe poor Barbarians, than the ſecond in Rome (Q). It is eaſy to imagine, that Cæſar, with theſe ſentiments, could not continue idle in his province. To find himſelf work there, he made war on the innocent Spaniards, and, advancing as far as the ocean, ſubdued ſeveral nations, which had never before been ſubject to Rome. Having ſettled his province in peace, he returned to Rome, carrying with him ſufficient ſums to diſcharge his debts, which amounted to one million ſix hundred thouſand pounds ſterling, ſo great was his extravagance and profuſion. His heart was ſet on a triumph and the conſulate; but chiefly on the latter, which he could not obtain, without appearing perſonally at the comitium. On the other hand, thoſe who demanded a triumph were obliged to halt in the ſuburbs, and there wait for the anſwer of the ſenate. Being therefore reduced to the dilemma either of laying aſide the thoughts of a triumph by going into the city, or to give up the conſulſhip by ſtaying in the ſuburbs, he readily renounced the former, and purſued the latter, leaving nothing unattempted in order to ſucceed. His management on this occaſion was a maſter-piece of Cæſar ſent into Spain.

His ambition.

Aſpires to the conſulate.

(Q) Plutarch adds to this, that while he was one day reading the hiſtory of Alexander the Great, he appeared very thoughtful, and at laſt burſt out into tears, anſwering his friends, who aſked him the reaſon of his grief, do you think I have not juſt cauſe to weep, when I conſider, that Alexander, at my age, had conquered ſo many nations, while I have yet done nothing that is memorable?

policy, and the foundation of his future grandeur. The two citizens, who at this time made the greateſt figure in the republic, were, without diſpute, Pompey and Craſſus; but theſe two powerful citizens were declared enemies, and, all things conſidered, much upon a level. As they had both great intereſt, Cæſar plainly ſaw, that he could never obtain the conſulſhip, without gaining one or other of them to his cauſe; but the difficulty was which to chooſe. If he cloſed with Pompey, he would meet with a ſtrong oppoſition from Craſſus's friends; and if he joined Craſſus, he was ſure to have all Pompey's party againſt him. He therefore undertook to reconcile the two rivals, and by propoſing to them a triumvirate, in which ſhould be lodged all the authority of the ſenate and people, he prevailed upon them to make up their differences, and to enter into a ſtrict friendſhip with each other. In order to make their confederacy the more indiſſoluble, they ſolemnly bound themſelves by mutual oaths and promiſes to aſſiſt each other, and to ſuffer nothing to be undertaken or executed, without the unanimous conſent of all three. Thus was the firſt great triumvirate formed, by which Rome became a prey to three men, who, by the intereſt of their united parties, arbitrarily diſpoſed of all the dignities and employments in the commonwealth. The public were long ſtrangers to the myſteries of this new cabal. Nothing more appeared to the ſenate than the reconciliation of Pompey and Craſſus, and Cæſar was congratulated by all ranks of men for having brought it about. Cato alone foreſaw the evil conſequences of this new alliance, and exclaimed againſt it, ſaying, That Rome had loſt her liberty; but no body hearkened to him, till it was too late to follow his prudent counſel[t]. This aſſociation ſubſiſted to the death of Craſſus, and was followed by the entire ſubverſion of the republican ſtate.

The firſt triumvirate. Year of the Flood, 2944. Before Chriſt, 55. Of Rome, 693.

[t] Plut. in Pomp. Cæſ. & Catone. Dio, Caſſ. l. xxxvii. Appian. bell. civil. l. ii. Suet. in Julio.

AN

AN INDEX TO THE TWELFTH VOLUME.

The Figures direct to the Page, and Letter n to the Notes.

A

ABarus's ſpeech to Scipio, 373.

Abelox's ſtratagem to releaſe the Spaniſh hoſtages, 214.

Accua taken by young Fabius, 241.

Acerræ taken by Scipio, 178.

Acidinus Manl. ſent againſt the Spaniards, 275.

Acilius Glabrio's ſucceſs againſt Antiochus, 306.

Adherbal defeats the Romans, 142, & ſeq. And in Italy, 207, 208. His deſcent, 432. Flight to Rome, 433. Diveſted of the beſt part of his dominions, 434. Defeated and beſieged in Cirta by Jugurtha, 435. Surrenders and is cruelly murdered, 437.

Adis taken by Atil. Regulus, 124.

Afranius defeated and killed, 522.

——Forces Sertorius's camp, 608. Repulſed with loſs, ibid. & ſeq.

——An indolent conſul, 645, 646.

Ægades, the naval fight of, 152, 153.

Ahenobarbus Caius, Domitius's peaceful conſulſhip, 512.

Albinovanus proſcribed, 541. Treachery to the conſuls, 566.

Albinus Poſthum. a Friend to Maſſiva, 543. Ill ſucceſs in Numidia, 444. Suſpected of being bribed by Jugurtha, ibid. Baniſhment, ibid.

——A. Poſthum, choſen conſul, 507.

Albucius baniſhed, 486.

Allies, the war of, vid ſub War, 515. A general revolt of them, 518. Succeſs againſt the Romans, 520. Revolt to Cinna, ibid. & ſeq.

Ælius Petus's ill ſucceſs in Gaul, 296.

Æmilia, a Veſtal put to death, 428.

Æmilius Scaurus, ſee Scaurus, 427.

——Mamerc. Liv. choſen conſul, 591.

——Papus choſen dictator, 22.—L. Papus's victory over the Gauls, 173, & ſeq. His triumph, 174. —Quin choſen conſul, 30. —L. choſen dictator, ibid. —Barbulus reſtores the ſenate and prieſthood, 37. Defeats the Hetrurians, 38. Sent againſt the Tarentines, 86. Retires into Apulia, 88. Sent againſt the Sabines, ibid. Ill ſucceſs in Africa, 129, 130. Shipwrecked, ibid. —Paulus ſubdues the Illyrians, 180.

Tried and acquitted, ibid. Falls out with his raſh collegue, 216. Mortally wounded at Cannæ, 217. Dying meſſage to the great Fabius, 218, 219. Death, &c. ibid. & n. —Paulus's ſucceſs againſt the Macedonians, 325. Great triumph over them, 327. Death, 328.—Lepidus's unjuſt attempt againſt the Vaccei, 369.

Ambrones join with the Gauls, 489. Defeated by Marius, 491. Valour of their wives, ibid.

Ancharius Q. maſſacred by Marius, 550.

Annius, the bloody aſſaſſin of M. Anthony, 552.

———'s ſucceſs againſt Sertorius, 592.

Antiſtius P. butchered by young Marius, 564.

Antonius aſſaſſinates Sertorius, 616.

——— C. the conſul, ſwayed by Cicero, 631. Sent againſt Cataline, 635. Partiality to him, 640.

——— Marc. acquitted of debauching the Veſtals, 431. Clears the ſeas of pirates, 488. Choſen conſul, 505. Oppoſes the Agrarian law, ibid. Aſſaſſinated by Annias, officer of Marius, 552. His character, 553.

——— the triumvir, defeated by the pirates, 613.

Æqui, totally ſubdued, 45.

Æſculapius brought to Rome, 73. His birth, temple, art, &c. ibid. n.

Ætolians diſlike the peace made by Flaminius, 299. invite Antiochus into Europe, ibid. Raiſe new troubles in Greece, 305. Obtain a peace at the interceſſion of the Athenians, 307.

Africa plundered by the Romans, 122, 123. By their privateers, 147. By Scipio, 288.

Agis general of the Tarentines, a friend to the Romans, 87. Depoſed by Cyneas, ibid.

Agrarian law, revived by M. Flaminius, 166. By Tib. Gracchus, 377. Put in execution, 381.

Agrigentum beſieged by the Romans, 107, & ſeq. Taken, 109.

Aix in Provence, by whom founded, 402.

Albius's mutiny puniſhed, 274.

Aleria taken by the Romans, 117.

Alſius Mar. general of the Campanians, defeated and killed by the Romans, 235.

Allobroges defeated by the Romans, 420. Submit to them, 421.

———'s embaſſadors diſcover Catiline's conſpiracy to Fabius Sanga, 635.

Allucius gained over to the Romans, by Scipio's generous behaviour, 261.

Amiternum taken by Corvilius, 68.

Androſthenes general of Philip, defeated by Nicoſtratus, 298.

Aneroeſtus king of Geſatæ invades the Romans, 172. Defeated, kills himſelf, 174.

Anicius, 326, & ſeq. Reduces Illyricum in 30 days, 323. Triumphs, 327.

Antiates, ſubmit to the Romans, 30, & n.

Antillus ſtabbed in the Capitol by one of the faction of the Gracchi, 412, 413.

Apollo's temple plundered by Cæpio, 475. The ſacrilege puniſhed, 478.

Apollonius, Cæſar and Cicero's maſter, 603. Different from Molan, ibid. & n. His elogy of Cicero, 604, n.

Apollonia taken by the Romans, 169.

Apollonian embaſſadors inſulted by the ædiles, 96. Their puniſhment, ibid. The Apolloniates behaviour to them, ibid.

Appius Craſſus choſen cenſor, 35. His character, ibid. Debaſes the ſenate and prieſthood, ibid. His noble works, 36. Second conſulate, 45. Choſen prætor, 46. Reduced to great ſtraits in Hetruria, 57. Sarcaſm againſt Volumnius, 58. Retaliated by Fabius, 59, 60.

——— Treachery to the Camerinians, 94. Condemned by the ſenate, ibid. Outwits the Carthaginians, and ſails into Sicily, 104. Defeats Hiero and the Carthaginians, ibid.

——— Pulcher choſen conſul, 244. Marches againſt Capua, 246. Wounded before it, 251. Surprized by Hannibal, 255. Takes Capua and therein fifty three of their ſenators, 256 Conceals the ſenate's orders and puts them to death, ibid.

Aponins's ſucceſs againſt the Romans, 521. Outwitted and beat by Sylla, 526.

Apuans defeated, 313.

Apulius Luc. Saturn, one of the tribunes intrigues for Marius, 487. For Equitius, 488. Murders his competitor, and ſeizes the tribuneſhip, 501. Inſolence to the Pontic embaſſadors, ibid. Renews the Agrarian conteſt, 501. His conſpiracy, 505. Seizes the Capital, 506. Death, 507.

Apulia, ſubdued by the Romans, 30.

Apulians ally with the Samnites, 16. Defeated by Fabius, 17. By Plautius, 29.

Aqueduct of Appius deſcribed, 36, n.

Aquilius Man. left with the Roman command in Sicily, 487. Ends the war with the ſlaves there 499. Honoured with an oration, 500. Defeated by Sertorius, 598.

——— Florus choſen conſul, 116. Surrounded by the enemy, is relieved by a legionary tribune, 118. Drives the Carthaginians out of Sicily, ibid.

Aquilonia made the Samnite rendezvous, 67. Taken by the Romans, 70.
Ara Maxima, by whom founded, 35.
Archagathus a celebrated ſurgeon, why ſurnamed butcher, 191.
Arpi taken by the Fabii, 243.
Arverni defeated by the Romans, 420.
Aſdrubal defeated by Metellus, 134. Crucified by the Carthaginians, 135.
——the ſucceſſor of Hamilcar, his ſucceſs in Spain, 170. Death, 179, ——brother of Hannibal, left to command Spain, 185. Defeated by the Celtes, 214. Succeſs againſt the Romans, 228. Sent into Italy, ibid. Defeated by the two Scipios, ibid.
——the Bald, defeated in Sardinia, 237. Defeats the two Scipios, 247. His camp ſurpriſed and burnt by Marcius, 249. Outwits the Roman general, 257, & ſeq. Driven out of Spain, 266. Marches into Italy, 270. Defeated and killed there, 271.
——the ſon of Giſco, defeated by Scipio, 272. Betrayed by Maſiniſſa, 280, & n. His camp burnt by Scipio, 282. Serves as a private man. 285.
——the ram's moving ſpeech to the Roman ſenate, 293. Juſt anſwer to the conſul, ibid.
——the ſon of Hamilcar, made general, 283. Defeated by Maſiniſſa, 337. Condemned and eſcapes, 340. Recalled, 342. Deſtroys the Roman Fleet, 344. Cruelty to the Romans, 349. Boaſting anſwer to the Roman conſul, 351. Cruel one to his wife and children, 353. Cowardly ſurrender, ibid. & 354. Puniſhed by his deſperate wife in his children, 354.
Aſcalis, defeated by Sertorius, 594.
Aſculana, taken by Sylla, 525.
Aſculum revolts from the Romans, and cut to pieces the proconſul and all his forces, 519. Beſieged and taken by Cn. Pompey, 523.
Aſellio Aul. Semp. aſſaſſinated at Rome, by the rich uſurers, 524.
Aſpar's negociation in favour of Jugurtha, 470. Outwitted by Bocchus, 472.
Athenio head of the rebel ſlaves, 485. Impriſoned by Salvius, ibid. & 486. Let at liberty by Salvius and defeated by the Romans, 499. Relieves Tricola, ibid. Succeſs againſt the Romans, 500. Killed in ſingle combat, ibid.
Atlantic iſlands, ſee fortunate, 593, n.
Attilius C. Serranus, murdered, 551.
Auſidus, one of the conſpirators againſt Sertorius, 614. His miſerable end. 617.
Aulus Poſthumus's ill ſucceſs in Numidia, 446. Recalled and baniſhed, 447.
——— Fulvius puts his ſon to death for conſpiring with Catiline, 635.
Aſtapa, the ſiege and ſad cataſtrophe of, 273.
Aternum taken by the Romans, 244.
Athletæ when firſt introduced at Rome, 314.
Atrius, a mutinous Roman, beheaded, 274.
Attalus bequeaths Pergamus to the Romans, 383.
Attilius ſurprized by the Samnites, 64. Defeats them, 66.
—Regulus takes Brunduſium from the Salentines, 95. Triumphs over the Carthaginians, 120. Killed by the Gauls, 173.
— Marc. Regulus defeats the Carthaginians, 120, 121. Succeſs in Africa, 122, & ſeq. Deſtroys the ſerpent of Bagrada, 123. Conqueſts in Africa, 124, & ſeq. Offers peace to Carthage, 125. Defeated, and taken priſoner, 127, 128. Cruelty uſed by the Carthaginians, 128. Sent to the Roman ſenate, 135. His ſpeech to the conſcript fathers, 136. Returns to Carthage, 137. Tortured to death there, ibid. & n.
— Calalinus ſurrounded in a valley by the Carthaginians, 117, 118. Relieved by one of his legionary Tribunes, 118. His ſucceſs in Sicily, 120, & ſeq.
— Regulus II. choſen conſul, 212. Proconſul, 215. Killed, 219.
Atys, king of the Gauls, defeated and killed, 162.
Auctorati, what, and whence ſo called, 409, n.
Aulius Ceratanus killed by the Samnites, 631.
Aurelius Ovat. reconciles the two conſuls, 620, 621.
— Cotta's ſucceſs in Sicily, 132. Againſt Lilibæum, 146.
— Oreſtes's ſucceſs in Sardinia, 396, 397.
— Penicula, whipped and degraded, 132.
Aurinx taken by Scipio, 271.
Auſculum taken by the Romans, 94.
Auſona taken by the Romans, 33.
Auſones conquered by the Romans, 3.

B

BÆbius baſely bribed by Jugurtha, 442.
Balbus ſent by Sylla to ſuccour Rome againſt the Samnites, 568.
Baleric iſlands, ſubdued, 402.
Baliſtæ, a warlike inſtrument, deſcribed, 88.
Bantius incines to the Carthaginians, 229. Obliged by Marcellus, quits their party, and reduces Nola to his obedience, ibid & & ſeq.
Bardiæans, Marius's troops, why ſo called, 550. Their horrid butcheries, &c. at Rome, ibid. All cut off by Cinna, 551.

Barrus, L. Betuc. debaueches ſome veſtals, 428.

Baſilius L. ſeizes the Eſquiline gate, 530.

Bellienus uncle to Catiline baniſhed by Cæſar, 630.

Beſtia L. Calpurnus's ſordid character, 438. Bribed by Jugurtha, ibid. Grants him a ſhameful peace, 440. Tried and baniſhed, 445.

Bitultic's whimſical embaſſy to Domitius, 419. Defeated by Fabius, 420. Betrayed by Domitian, ibid. Led in triumph, 421. Confined to the city of Alba, ibid.

Bœtica, the battle of, 172.

Bocchus's alliance with Jugurtha, 461. Surprizes the Romans but is defeated, 468. Treats and ſends embaſſadors to Rome, 469. Obtains a peace, 470. Anſwer to Sylla, 471. Double treachery, 473. Delivers up Jugurtha to Sylla, 474. Gratitude to Sylla, 512.

Boiorix's challenge to Marius, 496. Defeated and killed, 497.

Bomilcar aſſaſſinates Maſſiva at Rome, 443. Returns to Africa, 444. Made Jugurtha's general, 450. Defeated, ibid. Diſcovered, 457. Put to death, 458.

Boii, defeated by Domitius, 160. Subdued by Valerius Falto, 83. Revolt, 185, 296. Defeated by Merula, 304. Subdued by Scipio Naſica, 306.

Boſtar tortured to death at Rome, 138. Outwitted by Abelox, 214.

Bovianum taken from the Samnites, 38.

Bracatrinian women, their intrepid bravery, 366, 367.

Brazen gate at Rome, whence ſo called, 160, n.

Brunduſium taken by the Romans, 95.

Brutii, Subdued by the Romans, 91. Maſſacred by Hannibal, 287.

Brutus the prætor, inſulted by Sylla's ſoldiers, 530. Defeated by young Pompey, 562.

— Junius butchers all Sylla's friends, 564. Taken priſoner and beheaded, 570.

— M. Junius beheaded by Pompey, 591.

— D. Junius choſen conſul, 12. Defeats the Samnites, 39.

— Scæva defeats the Hetrurians, 71. His triumph, 76. Succeſs againſt the Luſitanians, 169.

Bubulcus, Junius, general of the Roman horſe, breaks his way through the Hetrurians, 44.

Byria, the ſad condition of, 533. Taken by the Romans, ibid. & ſeq.

C

Cæcilius Pius's ſucceſs againſt the Marſi, 528.

Cælius why nicknamed Caldus, 514.

Cæpio Q. Servil. ſucceſs in Gaul, 475. Shameful avarice, ibid. Fatal rupture with Maſſius, 476. Puniſhment, 478. Heads the diſcontented knights, 516. Defeated and killed, 521.

CæſarSextus Julius choſen conſul, 515, n.

— — Julius born, 507. Choſen conſul, 518. Defeated by Vettius, 521. Saluted imperator, 522. Marries Cornelia, 559. Brave oppoſition againſt Sylla, 585. Retires into Bithynia, 586. Diſplays his oratory againſt Dolabella, 602, Character as to eloquence by Plutarch, ibid. n. Adventure with pirates, 603. Saves Bithynia, 613. Backs the Manilian law, 626. Profuſely popular, 628. Sets up the Marian trophies, 629. Partiality to Catiline, 630. Oration in favour of the conſpirators, 637. Narrowly eſcapes, ibid. Depoſed and reſtored, 639. Accuſed of conſpiring with Catiline, 641. Acquitted by Cicero, ibid. Choſen Pont. Max. ibid. Divorces Pompeia, 643. Unmeaſurable ambition, 647. Politic maſterpiece, ibid. & ſeq.

Caius Julius choſen conſul, 518. Defeated by Vettius, 521.

——Billius's dreadful death, 386.

Cale taken by the Romans, 3.

Calpurnius Flamma's memorable exploit, 118. Reward, ibid.

—— Piſo killed by the Luſitanians, 331.

—— L. Piſo's ill ſucceſs in Afric, 347. Defeats the rebels in Sicily, 390. Why ſurnamed Frugi, 391, n. Killed in Gaul, 459.

Camerinum, taken by the Romans, 94.

Campania, overrun by the Allies, 521.

Campanian legion's treachery to the Rhegians, 92. Puniſhment, 93.

Cannæ, where ſituate, 215, n. The battle thereof, 217, 218.

Canuſium, the retreat of, by the Romans, 220, 222.

Caparania, a veſtal condemned, ſtrangles herſelf, 98.

Capſa taken and razed, 463.

Capuans friendly aſſiſtance to the Roman routed army, 21. A conſpiracy formed there, 25. Diſcovered, the conſpirators kill themſelves, ibid. The reſt ſubmit to the Romans, 29. To Hannibal, 226. Kill the Roman garriſon, ibid. Beſieged by the Romans, 250. Relief attempted in vain, 251. Surrender, 256. Severely uſed, ibid.

Carbo raiſes a new ſedition in Rome, 392.

——Papir. vid. ſub Papirus, 423.
Caricini taken by Fabius Pictor, 93.
Carinas defeated by Metell. Pius, 564. Beheaded, 570.
Carni ſubdued, 427.
Carthage new, taken by Scipio, 260.
—— old, the ſad cataſtrophy of, 355, & ſeq. A law for the rebuilding of it, 406.
Carthaginians, cauſe of their firſt war with Rome, 100, & ſeq. Defeated before Agrigentum, 108. At ſea, 113, 119. Before Heraclea, 120. Before Adda, 124, 125. Rejected the offered conditions of peace, 126. Defeat the Roman army, 127, 128. Defeated by ſea and land, 129. Make freſh preparations, 134. Defeated and exhauſted, ibid. & ſeq. At ſea by Lucanus, 152. Make a hard peace with him, 153. Their pacific embaſſy to Rome, 163. Anſwer to the Roman embaſſadors, 165. Complaints againſt Hannibal, 182. Send him freſh ſupplies, 227. Defeated in Spain, 242. Driven out of it, 266. Invaded by Scipio, 279. Suſtain a general defeat, 283. Perfidy to the Romans, 286. Defeated afreſh, 291. Sue for peace, 292. Ratify it, 294. Affront the Roman embaſſador, 334. Give freſh umbrage to Rome, 336. Defeated by Maſiniſſa, 337. Butchered by his ſon, 338. Surrender their arms to the Romans, 341. Reſolve on a deſperate defence, 342. Blocked up by ſea and land, 349. Make a brave defence, 250. Put to fire and ſword, 353. Totally deſtroyed, 355, & ſeq.
Carthalo ſunt againſt the Roman fleet, 144. Recalled, 146.
Carvilius Spur. ſubdues the Corſicans and Sardinians, 164.
—— Ruga forced to divorce his barren wife, 164.
Caſilinians murdered by the Preneſtines, 230.
Caſilinum beſieged by Hamilcar, 230. Taken after a very brave defence, 232. Retaken by Fabius and ill treated by Marcellus, 241.
Caſſius, ſent to fetch Jugurtha, 442.
—— Quin. a legionary deprived of his command by Aurelius, 132.
Caſtulo taken by Sertorius, 510.
—— retaken by the Romans, 105.
Catana delivered up to the Romans, 105.
Catanea taken by ſtratagem, 575.
Catiline Luc. Serg. the tool of Sylla's cruelties, 572. His impieties, 573, n. Vile character, 627. Conſpiracy, 628. The names of his accomplices, 630. Accuſed by Cicero, 633. Retires to Feſulæ, 634. Proſcribed, 635. Betrayed by the Allobroges, ibid. Prevented from marching into Gaul, 640. Reſolves to give Antonius battle, ibid. Defeat, bravery, and death, 641.
Cato ſent quæſtor into Sardinia, 297, 298. Perfects his genius under Ennius, 298. His auſterity, ibid. & ſeq. Oppoſes the repeal of the Oppian law, 301. Succeſs in Spain, 302. Frugal character, 301. Serves as a legionary tribune, and aſſiſts Glabrio in driving Antiochus out of Greece, 306. A ſecret enemy to Scipio Africanus, 310. And to his brother, 312. Plays the rigid cenſor, 315. His true character, 316. Partiality againſt the Carthaginians, 330, 331. His death, 345.
—— M. Portius dies in Numidia, 426.
—— C. Port. ill ſucceſs in Macedonia, 428. Baniſhment, ibid.
—— L. Port. choſen conſul, 438. Killed by Marius, 525.
—— Uticenſis noble ſpeech againſt Sylla, 574, 575. Againſt Cæſar and the conſpirators, 637.
Catulus Quint. Lutat. choſen conſul, 487. His character, ibid. n. Ill ſucceſs againſt the Cimbri, 494. Gives them a total defeat, 497. His triumph and temple, ibid. & ſeq. & 553. Made conſul, 588. Falls out with his collegue, 590, 591. Obtains funeral honours for Sylla, ibid. Artful ſpeech againſt Pompey, 624. Strenuous oppoſition of the Manilian law, 626. Brave accuſation of J. Cæſar, 629, & ſeq.
Caudex Appius, whence ſo called, 104.
Caudine forks, the Romans intrapped in, 18.
Caudium, taken by Lentulus, 90.
Cele, taken by the Romans, 224.
Celtiberians ally with Cn. Scipio, 214. Treachery to him, 247. Defeated by Fulvius, 303, 318.
—— bravery, 514. Outwitted by Didius, ibid.
Celtic Gauls, ſee Gauls, 476, & ſeq.
Cenſorinus advances againſt Rome, 565. Defeated by Sylla, taken priſoner and beheaded, 570.
Cercina iſland where ſcituated, 541.
Cethegus accompanies young Marius into Numidia, 540. Defeats him and comes over to Sylla, 561. Conſpires with Catiline, 630. Seized 636. Impriſoned, 637. Encourages his friends to ſet him at liberty, ibid. Put to death, 638. Succeſs againſt the Gauls, 299.
Centumvirs, when firſt inſtituted, 166.
Cephaledium taken by the Romans, 130.
Chariots, armed, when, and by whom introduced, 62.
Cipus M. Genalius, ſent againſt the Boii, 159. The fable of his two horns, 160 n.

Cicero's character of Opimius, 445. When born, 476. First campaign, 525. Pleads in publick, 586. Retires to Athens, ibid. Speech in favour of Pompey, 626. Judgment of J. Cæsar, 629. First consulship, 631. Unravels Catiline's conspiracy, ibid. Accuses him to the senate, 633. Styled father of his country, 636. Saves Cæsar, 638. Partiality to him, 641. Speech against P. Clodius, 642, n.

Cimbri, where situate, 429. Invade Italy, ibid. Defeat the Romans, 430. Ravage Helvetia, ibid. n. Defeat the Romans, 477. March towards Italy, 489. Inject a panic where they come, 494. Totally defeated and destroyed, 497.

Cimbrian women their desperate end, 497.

Cinna, L Cornel. chosen consul, 533. His bad character, ibid. Falshood to Sylla, 542. To his collegue, ibid. Heads the allies, 543. Treachery to Pompey, 547. Debauches the citizens, 548. Enters Rome, 549. Nominates himself consul, 554. Opposes Sylla's return, 555. Third consulship, 556. Tyranny, ibid. Allies with J. Cæsar, 559. Marches against Sylla, ibid. Murdered by his own soldiers, ibid.

Clastidium betrayed to Hannibal, 197.

Claudia, fined by the ædiles, 148.

Claudius Marcellus divested of his dictatorship, 9.

—— Carina triumphs over the Lucanians, 90.

—— Quinct. takes Rhegium, 93.

—— the tribune's speech to the Mamertines, 201. Seizes on Messana, 103. Ravages Syracuse, 105.

—— Pulcher's attempt on Drepanum, 142. Defeated by Adherbal, 143. Deposed and tried, ibid. & seq.

—— Glycias, made dictator in derision, 143. Makes a shameful peace with Corsica. 162. His punishment, ibid. & n.

—— M. Murællus made consul, 177. Kills the Gaulish king in a single combat, ibid. His triumph, 178. Sent against Hannibal, 223. Defends Nola, 230. Second consulship, 234. Abdicates, ibid. Defeats Hannibal, 236. Third consulship, 238. Defeats Hannibal, 240. Sent into Sicily, 242. Success in Apulia, 258. Repulses Hannibal, 259. Defeated by him, 263. Defeats him next day, 264. Surprised and killed, 267.

—— Pulcher's success against the Salassi, 359. Triumphs in spight of the senate, ibid. & seq.

—— Nero, vid. sub. Nero, 257.

—— Pub. Pulch. games exhibited by, 507.

—— Appius betrays the Janiculum, 547, 548.

—— a young partician killed before Rome, 567.

—— Appius Pulcher, chosen consul, 586. Defeated by the Slaves, 617.

Clodius Publ. lewdness and sacrilege, 642. Courted by Pompey, 646.

Cluentius put to flight by Sylla, 526. Killed by him, ibid.

Clupea, taken by the Romans, 122. Evacuated, 129.

Cominium taken by the Romans, 70.

Compsa surrendered to Hannibal, 226.

Comum taken by the Romans, 178.

Coxus, a Gaulish slave defeated and killed, 617.

Copillus taken prisoner, 482.

Concord, a monument of Opimius's cruelty, 418.

Concolitanus invades Rome, 172. Taken prisoner, 174.

Contrebia, taked by the Romans, 360.

Corcyra betrayed to the Romans by Demetrius, 168.

Corsinium, made the metropolis of the Marsi, 519.

Cornelia, a prisoner put to death, 5.

—— the mother of Gracchus, incites him to sedition, 376. Her two letters to her son Caius, 398, 399, n.

Cornelius Arvina, Rechosen consul, 46. Kills thirty thousand Samnites, 47.

—— Barbatus chosen dictator, 48.

—— Scipio, vid. sub Scipio, 54.

—— Lentulus triumphs over the Lusitanians, 90. Over the Gauls, 161.

—— Blasius, why surnamed Censorinus, 98.

— Asina's success in Sicily, 130. Triumph, 132.

—— prætor of Sardinia, dies of the plague, 164.

—— Coruncianus Tiberius, a plebeian chosen consul, 88. Pontifex maximus, 133. Degrades 13 lewd senators, ibid.

Cornelians whence so named, 581.

Cornutus saved by his faithful slaves, from the cruelty of Marius, 552.

Corsica conquered by the Romans, 117. Revolts, 162. Reduced by Marius, ibid. Made a Roman province. 167.

Cortona and other leucumonies make truce with Rome, 41.

Corvilius's success against Samnium, 67, & seq.

—— Maximus quite subdues them, 91.

Corvus, when and by whom invented, 112. Described, ibid. Of great service to the the Romans, in a ſea-fight with the Carthaginians, ibid. & 113.

Coſconius's ſucceſs againſt the Samnites, 525.

Cotho taken by Lælius, 351.

Cotta L. Aurel. ſucceſsful conſulate, 423. Pleads for Dolabella, 602. Paſſes a law in favour of the tribunes, 606. Ill ſucceſs againſt Mithridates, 613.

Craſſus M. Licinius pleads for the veſtal Licinia, 429. Choſen conſul, 512. Accuſed of a ſtrange fondneſs for his Murena, 515. Sent againſt Spartacus, 618. Defeats 10,000 rebels, ibid. Defeats and kills Spartacus and 40,000 rebels, 619. Choſen conſul, 620. Falls out with Pompey, ibid. & ſeq. Diſbands his army, 621. Profuſe popularity, ibid. Favours Catiline's conſpiracy, 630. Strives to clear himſelf, 633, n. Accuſed by Tarpin, 636. His immenſe wealth, 645. His ſecurity for Cæſar, 647. And by him reconciled to Pompey, 648.

— Publ. Marc. murdered, 551.

— M. defeats the Samnites and ſaves Rome, 569.

Creditors, their power on their debtors, clipped, 11.

Crete iſland reduced by Metellus, 622.

Crocodile at Bagrada, taken by the Romans for a monſtrous ſerpent, 123.

Cumæ, by whom built, 7.

Curio Caius's noble ſpeech to the comitia, 601.

Curius Q. one of Catiline's conſpirators, 630.

Curius Man. Dentat. choſen conſul, 76. Ends the Samnian war, 77. His character, ibid. Ravages the Senones, 82. His noble triumph over Pyrrhus, 89. His poverty, ibid.

Cyclades invaded by Demetrius, 179.

Cyneas ſent to Tarentum, 87.

Cyrtha taken by Maſiniſſa, 284.

D

DABUR, grandſon of Maſiniſſa, a friend to the Romans, 470. Induces Bocchus to be a friend to them, ibid.

Daci, where ſituated, 541, n.

Dalmatia ſubdued by Cotta, 423.

Damophilus's cruelty to his ſlaves, 387. His puniſhment, 388, & ſeq.

Debts, the payment of, regulated, 79, & ſeq.

Decemvirs augmented to fifteen, 579.

Decianus C. Plaut. baniſhed for ſpeaking in favour of Apuleus, 511.

Decius P. conſuls ſucceſs in Hetruria, 44, 45. Made pontifex, 51. Succeſs in Apulia, 56. Againſt Samnium, ibid. & ſeq. Conteſt with Fabius, 59. Joined with Fabius in Hetruria, ibid. Devotes himſelf to death, 62.

Decula M. Tull. choſen conſul, 578.

Delminium taken by Scipio Naſica, 331.

Demetrius, the Pharian, betrays Corcyra to the Romans, 168. Made regent of Illiricum, 170. Revolts from Rome, 179. Defeated, ibid.

Devoting the cuſtom of in Spain, 599, & n.

Dial, ſon, the firſt in Rome, how made, 71 n.

Didius, T. ſucceſs againſt the Scordiſci, 428. Choſen conſul, 509. Succeſs in Spain, 510. Cruel butcheries there, ibid. Defeated by Sertorius, 596.

Dimalum taken by the Romans, 180.

Dium taken by the Romans, 322, 323.

Divorce become frequent among the Romans, 164.

Dolabella, Cornel. triumphs over the Luſitanians, 511. Choſen conſul, 578. Accuſed by Cæſar and acquitted, 602.

Domitius Cn. Calvinus's ſucceſs againſt the Senones, 82. againſt the Gauls, 419. Treachery to the Arvernian king, 420.

— L. butchered by young Marius 564.

— Cneius Ahenobarbus defeated in Afric, 582. Killed, ibid.

—Lucius defeated in Luſitania, 596.

Drepanum, the ſiege of, 147. Raiſed, 150. Reſumed, 151.

Druſus, M Lucius ends the Scordiſcan war, 431. The innocent cauſe of the ſocial war, 515. His noble ſcheme to alleviate the public diſcontents, 516. Sends the conſuls to priſon, 517. His ſingular probity, ibid. Death and laſt remarkable words ibid. Character. 518.

Ducarius, an Inſubrian, kills Flaminius, 206.

Dulius Cai. commands the Roman army, 111. The fleet, 112. Defeats the Carthaginians, 113. His triumph, 115. The Columna roſtrata raiſed to his honour, ibid. n.

Duumviri Navales, their office, 38.

Dwarfs, their fights on the Roman ſtage deſcribed, 410.

E

ELephants, when firſt led in triumph at Rome, 89. One hundred and four follow Metellus's triumph, 134. Baited to death afterwards, 135.

Enna taken by the Sicilian ſlaves, 388.

Ennius the poet, his works, birth, &c. 158. Inſtructs Cato in Sardinia, 298.

Epulones, the firſt inſtitution, 300.

Epaphroditus, Sylla why ſo ſurnamed, 582, n.

Equitius L. Firm. rejected by Metellus, 489. Choſen tribune by force and murder, 505. His death, 507.

Eſernia, made a magazine by the allies in the ſocial war, 525.

Erbeſſa, made a Roman magazine, 107. Delivered up to the Carthaginians, 108.

Eryx ſurprized by the Romans, 145. Retaken by Hamilcar, 149.

Errius Potitius diſcovers a dangerous conſpiracy, at Rome, 116.

Eſcadia, where ſituate, 361, n.

Eubutii procure a new tribunal, which ſubſiſts ever after at Rome, 166.

Eumenes aſſiſts Scipio againſt the Syrians, 308. Victory at Magneſia owing to his bravery, ibid. Stabbed by Perſes for his friendſhip to Rome, 320.

Eunus made chief of the Sicilian ſlaves, 387. Proclaimed king, 389. Succeſs againſt the Romans, ibid. & ſeq. Defeated, 391. His death, ibid.

F

FAbius Quinct. ſucceſs againſt the Arpini, 243.

—— Q. Rullianus, choſen maſter of the horſe, 12. Condemned by the dictator, and reſcued by the ſoldiers, ibid. & 13. Pardoned by him at the requeſt of the people, 14. Succeſs againſt the Samnites, 16.

—— Q. Maximus, why ſo called. 50. Choſen dictator, 31. Defeats the Samnites, ibid. Before Sora, 32. The Hetrurians, 39. Opens a way through the Ciminian foreſt, 40. Defeats the Umbrians, 42. Hetrurians, 43. Umbrians, 45. Samnites, 46. Reforms the ſtate, 50. Defeats the Marſi, &c. ibid. The Samnites, &c. 54, & ſeq. Hetrurians, 60, & ſeq. Gauls, 62, & ſeq. Oppoſes his ſon's election, 71. His death and character, 80.

—— Maximus Verrucoſ his character, 165. Choſen prodictator, 208. Why ſurnamed Cunctator, 209. Succeſs againſt Hannibal, ibid. Over-reached by him, 210. Recalled by the ſenate, 211. Speech to them, 212. His maſter of the horſe put on equality with him, ibid. Saves his colleague and defeats the Carthaginians, 213. Wholſome advice to the ſenate, 225. His third conſulate, 234. Waſtes the Capuans, 237. Fourth conſulate, 237. Succeſs in Campania, 240, & ſeq. Takes Tarrentum, 264. Merry judgment of the Tarentine pictures, ibid. Saved by the Augurs, 265.

—— Pictor, why ſo called, 50.

—— Gurges, vid. ſub Gurges, 71.

—— Buteo appointed to name the new ſenators, 232.

Fabricius's ſucceſs againſt the confederates, 83, & n.

Falernian tribe, whence ſo called, 29.

Faliſci, defeated by Brutus, 71. Subdued by Cerco, 155.

Falling ſickneſs, a bloody remedy againſt, uſed at Rome, 408, n.

Fannias gratitude to Marius, 537.

Fannius Gaius ſaves the Roman camp, 360.

—— C. Strabo choſen conſul, 403. Oppoſes Gracchus, 404.

Fæſulæ, the colony of, drawn into Cataline's conſpiracy, 632.

Fauſtus and Fauſta, Sylla's twins, whence ſo named, 582, n.

Fencing-maſters, when firſt introduced, 479.

Feronia, the temple of, plundered by Hannibal, 255.

Fimbria Caius Fulv. a bloody tool of Marius, 551. Sent with Valerius againſt Sylla, 556. Forſaken by his troops, ibid. Oppoſes and kills Valerius, 557. Succeſs againſt Mithridates, 557. Threacherous deſign againſt Sylla, 558. Kills himſelf, ibid.

Flaccus Valerius's law in favour of debtors, 555. Sent to ſucceed Sylla, 556. Oppoſed by Fimbria, 557. Killed by him, ibid.

—— Sylla's friend made interrex, 577.

Flaminius, the tribune's father, ſilences him in the roſtrum, 166.

—— Nepos's unſucceſsful expedition againſt the Inſubres, 175. Retrieved by his brave tribune defeats them, 176. Choſen conſul againſt Hannibal, 201. His character, ibid. & n. Threatened by ill omens, 204, & ſeq. Defeated and killed, 206.

—— Quinctius's ſucceſs in Macedon, 298. Secures the freedom of Greece, 303. Succeſs in Spain, ibid. Gets his brother elected conſul in oppoſition to Scipio Africanus, 304.

Flavius Q. ſtrangely acquitted, 8. Choſen tribune, 7.

—— Nepos, a turbulent tribune, 646.

Fleet, the firſt Roman, unſucceſsful, 41. Polybius's account of it confuted, 102, n. A new one rebuilt, 110. A third by private perſons, 147.

Florentia, plundered by Sylla, 574.

Fonteius, murdered by Aſculans, 519.

Fortune, a new temple erected to, by Sempronius, 279.

Fortunate iſlands deſcribed, 593, n.

Foſtus Flaccinator made general of the horſe, tried and acquitted, 25, 26. Made a ſecond time a general of horſe, 34.

Francus defeated and killed, 523.
Fregellæ, colonied by the Romans, 7. Seized by the Samnites, 25. Revolt, 397, 338. Razed, ibid.
Freemen at Rome, inlisted, 523.
Fulvia, discovers Catiline's conspiracy to Cicero, 631.
Fulvis Marc. success in Spain, 486.
— L. Corvus triumphs over the Samnites, 17. Made general of horse, 30. Second triumph over the Samnites, 49.
— Petinus's success in Umbria, 52.
— Cn. Centumanus defeats the Samnites, &c. 54. Sails against the Illyrians, 168. Made proconsul there, 169. Ends the war, ibid. & seq. Reception of 112 Capuan nobles, 243. Besieges Capua, 250, & seq. Goes to the Relief of Rome, 253, & seq. Severity to the Capuans, 252. Defeated by Hannibal, 258.
— Flaccus triumphs over the Volsinii, 99. Intangled in Gaul, 161. Chosen consul, 262. Great authority in Greece, 309. Invectives against Scipio Africanus, 395. Against the patricians, 397. Sent to relieve Massilia, ibid. & seq. Exasperates the Gracchian faction, 412. Seizes mount Aventine, 413. Killed, 416.
— L. Nobilis triumphs over Ætolia, 314. His games exhibited, ibid. Ill success in Spain, 332.
— Young, why imprisoned, 415. Put to death, 418.
Fundi invaded by the Romans, 6.
Furconia taken by Papirius, 68.
Furius Pacilus chosen consul and sent into Sicily, 134. Recalled, ibid.
— Purpureo defeats the Gauls, 297, & seq.

G

GAbinian law proposed against pyrates, 623. Agreed to, 624.
Gabinius P. Capito conspires with Catiline, 630. Seized, 636. Put to death, 638.
Gæsatæ, whence so called, 171. Ally with the Gauls, ibid. Fight naked, 173. Defeated, 174, & 178.
Galatians, their origin, 308, 309. Invaded by the Romans, ibid. Make peace with them, 309.
Galatius, general of the transalpine Gauls, defeated and killed, 162.
Galba, Sulpicius infamous for his base treachery and avarice, 335. Horrid cruelties to the Lusitanians, 336.
Games of hazard forbid at Rome, 427.
Gaudas's treachery to Metellus, 456, & n.
Gauls defeat the consular army, 477. Defeated by Pompey, 562. Declare for Sylla, 563.
Gauls, join with the Hetrurians, 59. Defeated by Fabius, 62, & seq. Plot against Hamilcar defeated, 150. A new invasion, 171. Repulsed by Æmilius, 172. Defeated, 174. By Marcellus, 177, 178. Assist Hannibal over the Alps, 187. Treachery to the Romans, 196. Renew their hostilities, 296. Thirty thousand of them killed, 297. Thirty thousand more by Cethegus, 299. Eleven thousand by Sempronius, 303.
Gellius Poplicola, defeats the Gallish slaves, 617. Chosen consul, 621.
Geminius goes in search after Marius, 534. Brings him bound to Minturnæ, 537.
Gemoniæ Scalæ, what, 162, 163, n.
Gentilisci, subdued by the Romans, 427.
Gentius surprizes the consul Vulso, 318. His kingdom subdued by Anicius, and himself taken prisoner, 323. Led in triumph with his wife, children, &c. 327.
Germans, where first mentioned by Roman authors, 178, Triumphed over by Marcellus, ibid.
Geta Licinius, chosen consul, 427. Proscribed, ibid.
Gisgo raises new troubles at Carthage, 324.
Gladiators, when first introduced at Rome, 406, & n. Their manner of fighting, ibid. Reward, ibid. n. & seq. n. Different classes, ibid.
Glaucia, a creature of Marius, 501. Enters into a confederacy with him and Apuleius, ibid. Violent proceedings, 505. Death, 507.
Gods tutelar, how evocated at a siege, 352.
Good, goddess, the sacrifice of, 642, & n.
Gracchian law, what, 401. Repealed, 418. — Revived, 506, 508
Gracchus Tiberius, (enemy to the two Scipios) noble speech in favour of them, 311, 313. Marries Cornelia, ibid. & 375.
— his son raises a dreadful sedition, 376, & seq. Revives the Licinian law, ibid. & seq. Submits it to the senate, 379. Gets it passed, 381. Opposed by the senate, 383. His death, 385.
— Caius, chosen quæstor, 396. His popularity becomes dangerous, ibid. & seq. His true character, 400, & n. Laws, publick works, &c. 401, & seq. Outwitted by the senate, 404. Affronts the tribunes, 406, & seq. Leads the rebels to mount Aventine, 413, 414. Last fight and death, 416.

Gramen, or graſs crown, why given to Scipio Æmilianus, 345.

Granius accompanies Marius in his flight, 535. Is parted from him in a ſtorm, 536. Rejoins him, 539. Stragled by Sylla, 589.

Gratedius, friend to Marius, ſtoned to death by the ſoldiers of Sylla, 529.

Greece proclaimed free at the Olympic games, 299.

Guluſſa's deſcent, 11. His iſſue, 443.

— betrays the Carthaginians, 336. Treacherous cruelty to them, 338.

Gurges Fabius, builds a temple to Venus, 63 Defeated by the Samnites, 71. Reſcued by his father, 72. Sent embaſſador to Egypt, 90. Regulates the public revenue, 96. Defeats the Volſinii, but is ſlain, 99.

Gyriſenium taken by Sertorius, 510.

Gythium taken by the Romans, 303.

H

HAmilcar beſieges Segeſta, 114. Repulſes the Romans at Lipara, 119. Defeated before Heraclea, 121. Sent for to command at home, 123. His cruel death at Rome, 137.

— Barcas's ſucceſs againſt the Romans, 146, & ſeq. Sends proviſions to Lilybeum, 149. Defeated, 152. Sues for peace, 153, & ſeq. Forms two ſchemes againſt Rome, 158, & ſeq. Succeſs in Spain, 165. 169.

— the father of Hanno, repulſed by Scipio, 283, 284.

Hamilco commands in Lilybæum, 138. His brave defence, ibid. & ſeq.

Hannibal commands in Agrigentum, 107. Repulſed in a ſally, 109. Steals out in the night, ibid. Defeated at ſea, 111. Degraded, 114. Defeated and crucified 119.

— the ſon of Hamilcar ſent to relieve Lilybæum, 139.

— the ſon of Barcas, ſwears enmity to Rome. 159. Sent into Spain, 179. His conqueſts there, 181. Beſieges Saguntum, ibid. Anſwer to the Roman embaſſadors, 182. March into Italy, 185. Paſſes the Rhone, 187. The Alps, 188. Haraſſed by the mountaineers, 190. Breaks his paſſage through the rocks, 191. Enters Inſubria, 192. Succeſs in Italy, 193, & ſeq. Cruel ſtratagem to animate his army, 194, & ſeq. Defeats Scipio at Ticinus, 195. Defeats Sempronius at the Trebia, 200. Takes Victumviæ, 202. Attempt over the Appenine mountains, ibid. Painful march into Hetruria, 204. March towards Rome 205. Defeats the conſuls, at the lake of Thraſimenus, 206. Ravages Campania, 209. Stratagem to paſs through the Eribanus, 210. Defeated by Fabius, 213. Marches into Apulia, 215. Defeats the Romans, horſe and foot in a great engagement at Cannæ, 218. Entry into Capua, 226. Sends a vaſt number of rings to Carthage, 227, & n. Repulſed at Nola, 230. Retires to Capua, 231. Fatal debaucheries there, ibid. Takes Cuſilinum, 232. Succeſs in Great Greece, 234. Defeated before Nola, 236. His ſecond repulſe there, 240. Takes Tarentum, 245. Attempts the Relief of Capua, 251. Marches to Rome, ibid. Forced back, 254. Abandons the Capuans, 255. Surpriſes the Romans, 257 Repulſes Marcellus, 263. Defeated by him. 264. Kills him and his collegue in an ambuſcade, 267. Outwitted by the Salapians, 268. Defeated by Claudius Nero, 270. Labours with famine and peſtilence, 276. Defeated by Sempronius, 279. Recalled to Carthage, 287. Interview with Scipio, 289. Totally defeated 291. Retires to Antiochus, 306. His death, &c. 316.

— a Rhodian's bold attempt through the Roman fleet, 140. Taken priſoner, 141.

Hanno defeats the Roman fleet, 103. Abandons Meſſana to them, ibid. Crucified, ibid.

— II. maſſacres all the Italians in his army, 104. Commands the Carthaginian fleet, 107. Defeated by the Romans, 108. Killed at Olbia, 117.

— III. defeated at ſea, 121. Ventures an interview with the conſuls, ibid. Father and ſon repulſed by the Romans, 129.

— Carthaginian admiral, defeated, 152.

— the ſon of Bomilcar, ſent to ſurpriſe the Romans, 186. Taken priſoner by them, 204.

—Speech to the Carthaginians, 228. Defeated by Sempronius Longus, 235. Before Beneventum, 239. Sent to relieve Capua, 245. Defeated by Fulvius, ibid. Defeats the Romans, 247 Defeated by Silanus, 271. Taken priſoner by Scipio, 272, 279.

Helvetii, who, 440, & n. Invaded by the Cimbri, ibid.

Heraclea, taken by the Romans. 322.

Herculenum taken by the Romans, 70.

Herennius, a politic Samnite, 17. Oppoſite anſwers to his ſon, 19.

Hernici made ſlaves at Rome, 46. Subdued by Marcius, 47. Their fate, how determined, 48.

Herrius Aſinius, defeated and killd by Marius, 522.

Hetrurians revolt from the Romans, 522. Defeated, 523.

— Defeated by Fabius, 38, 43, 50, & ſeq. Over-run by Valer. Corvus, 54. By Fulvius Fulvius Centuman, ibid. & ſeq. By Volumnius, 58. Join with the Gauls, 60, & ſeq. Invaded by the Senones, 81. Defeated by the Romans, 83.

Hexametres, by whom invented, 158.

Hiarbas, king of Numidia comes into the Marian faction, 582. Defeated by Pompey and taken priſoner, ibid. Deprived of his dominions, 583.

Hiempſal's deſcent, 432. Murdered by Jugurtha, 433.

— treacherous reception of young Marius, 540. Outwitted by him, ibid. & ſeq.

Hiero allies with the Carthaginians, 104. Defeated by the Romans under Appius, ibid. Allies with them, 105. Kindneſs and friendſhip to them, 130, 132. Sends them convoys of proviſions at the ſiege of Lilybeum, 142. Cloaths the legionaries and ſailors at Meſſana, 184 His death, 237.

Hieronymus, ſon of Hiero inſults the Roman embaſſadors and allies with Carthage, 237.

Hilermus defeated by Scipio Naſica and taken priſoner, 303.

Himera taken by the Romans, 132.

Himilco's inſulting ſpeech to the brave Hanno, 227, & ſeq Sent into Spain, 228.

Hind, white, how uſed by Sertorius, 600.

Hippagreta, beſieged by the Romans, 347.

Hippo, the ſhips of, burnt by the Romans, 147.

Hirpini, reduced by the Romans, 235.

Hirtuleius quæſtor to Sertorius, defeats the Romans, 596. Defated and wounded by Metellus, 607.

Hortenſius, Q. a famed orator pleads for Dolabella, 602. Choſen conſul, 622.

— choſen to quell the plebeians, 80.

Hoſtilius A. Mancin. ill ſucceſs againſt Perſes, 321. Recalled, ibid.

— C Mancin. defeated by the Numantines, 367. Makes peace with them, ibid. Delivered up to them, 368.

I

Janiculum, the, blocked up by Marius, 547.

January, the month appointed for elections at Rome, 332.

Janus, temple of, ſhut up for the firſt time, 164.

Japidia revolts from the Romans, 394. Quelled by Sempronius, 396.

Iberians ſubmit to Scipio, 214.

Ignobles at Rome, whence ſo called, 513, n.

Illiturgis retaken and razed by Scipio, 273.

Illyrians, the cauſe of their war, 167. Reduced, 180. By Sempronius, 318. By Æmilius, 324. By Anicius, 327, & ſeq.

Imperator among the Romans, what, 522, & n.

Indibilis defeats the Romans, 248. Defeated by Scipio, 275. By the Roman proconſul and ſlaves, 277.

Ingauni, defeated by the Romans, 315. Reduced, 317.

Inſubres frighten the Romans back, 175. Subdued by Marcellus, 178. Made a Roman province, ibid. Revolt, 185.

Interamna, conſecrated by Sylla, 574.

Iſſa beſieged by the Illyrians, 167. Taken by the Romans, 169.

Iſaure taken by Sertorius, 612. Where ſituate, ibid. n.

Iſtria, conquered by the Romans, 178.

Iſtrians, ſubdued, 318.

Italian allies, repreſentation againſt the ſenate, 516. Somewhat cooled by the Julian law, 523. Made into a new tribe, 524. Careſſed by Sulpitius, 527.

Italy divided into two republics, 518, 519.

Judalicius's ſucceſs againſt the Romans, 521. Bravery and death at Aſculum, 523.

Jugurtha's deſcent, 432. Seizes the Numidian crown, ibid. Bribes the Roman ſenate, 434. Treachery and war againſt Adherbal, 435. Treachery and cruelty to him, 437. Summoned to Rome, 442. Eſcapes by bribery, ibid. & ſeq. Sarcaſtic farewell of that city, 444. Outwits Albinus, ibid. And Aulus, 446. Makes the Romans paſs under the yoke, 447. Defeated by Metellus, 449. By Marius, 452, Outwits Metellus, 453, 454. Defeated afreſh, 460, 468. Gives Sylla a free paſſage, 471. Betrayed by Bocchus, 473. Sent in chains to Rome, 474. Led in triumph, 480. His ſad end, ibid. His dominions, how divided by Marius, 476.

—— 's arrival at Scipio's camp, 371.

Julius Cæſar, ſee Cæſar, 507.

Junius M. Pera choſen dictator againſt Hannibal, 224. His prudent management, ibid.

—— Brutus ſettles a colony in Spain, 366.

Juventius Thalma defeated, 346.

K

Knights, Roman, four hundred degraded for diſobedience, 133. Made judges in private cauſes, 403.

——, Roman, puniſhed for extortion, 511. Conteſt againſt the ſenate, 516. Diveſted of their juriſdiction, 524. — 1600 of them proſcribed by Sylla, 572. Butchered by Catiline, ibid. & ſeq. The total of them, 586, 587. Favoured by Pompey, 621.

L

LAbeo's treachery to Metellus, 393, 394.
Lacedæmonians ſuccour the Carthaginians, 126.
Lacobriga, where ſituate, 597. Beſieged by Metellus, ibid.
Ladies, Roman, a number of them turn poiſoners, 5, & ſeq.
Lælius ſent to ravage Africa, 276. Defeats Syphax, and takes Cirtha, 284. Conducts him priſoner to Rome, 268. Choſen conſul, is defeated in his deſign of getting Aſia for his province, —eſteemed by Scipio Æmilianus, 348.
Lævinus commands the fleet againſt the Macedonians, 235. Saves Tarentum, 240. Surprizes the Macedonian camp, 242. Succeſs againſt the Carthaginians in Africa, 269. Againſt the Macedonians, 296.
Langians taken and maſſacred, 362, 363.
Laniſtæ at Rome, their bloody trade, 409, 32.
Larinates, ſubdued by Coſconius, 525.
Lauron beſieged by Sertorius, 605. Taken before Pompey's face and burnt, 606.
Law, ſacred, what, 43.
Lentulus Cornel. choſen dictator, 26. Defeats the Samnites, 27. Sent to command in Spain, 275. Oppoſes the Carthaginian peace, 293. — Defeated by the Capuan ſlaves, 617, & ſeq. Choſen cenſor, 621.
—Sura, choſen conſul, 618. Joins in Catiline's conſpiracy, 630. Seized, 636. Put to death, 638.
Lepidus M. Æmil. choſen firſt conſul by Pompey's intereſt, 588. Falls out with his collegue, 590. Raiſes new troubles, ibid. Defeated, 591. Repulſed in his ſecond attempt, ibid. Dies in Sardinia, 592.
Liberti, reduced into four claſſes, 189.
Liberty the chapel of, at Rome, when built, 148.
Libo C. Petilius choſen dictator, 34. His great ſucceſs in Samnium, ibid.
Licinia's pathetic ſpeech to Gracchus, 414. Deprived of her dowry, 418.
Licinius Nerva, ſee Nerva, 483
— L. Lucullus defeats the Sicilian ſlaves, 499. Baniſhed for extortion, 500.
— M. defeated by Lamponius, general of the allies, 521.
— Sextus, murdered by Marius, 554.
— P. Craſſus ſent againſt the Macedonians, 320. Defeated, 321. Defeats them, and goes into winter quarters, ibid.
Liguria, made a Roman province, 690.
Ligurians or Ligures, Defeated by the Romans, 160, 161. By Thermus, 304. Subdued by Flaminius, 310. By Sempronius, 319.
Lilybæum, the long ſiege of, 135. Turned into a blockade, 142.
Linteata Legio, what and whence, 68.
Lions firſt brought to Rome, 554.
Livius's works, birth, &c. 157.
— Pontifex, after the death of Decius, heads his army, 62.
— Salinator, reduces Illyricum, 180. Tried and condemned, ibid. Revenge on the tribes, ibid. Choſen conſul againſt Aſdrubal, 269. Defeats his army and kills him, 271.
— Druſus, ſent to undermine Gracchus, 405. His politic manner of accompliſhing it, ibid. & ſeq.
Lipara taken by the Romans, 132.
Locha taken by Scipio, 279.
Locri relieved by Hannibal, 268. Taken by Scipio, 277.
Lollius a Samnite revolts from the Romans, 93. Gives them a great deal of trouble, ibid.
Longinius Caſſius, defeated in Gaul, 485. Choſen conſul, 512.
Lucanians over-reached by the Samnites, 10, 11. Defeated by the Romans, 83. Totally ſubdued, 91.
Luceria taken by the Romans, 28. Retaken and colonied, 33, 34.
Lucius Cæcilius defeated with a great overthrow, and killed by the Gauls, 82.
—— Caius, nephew to Marius, killed for incontinence, 486.
Lucretius Licinus's cruelty to the Turduli, 335, & ſeq.
Lucullus's ſucceſs againſt Mithridates, 615. Recalled and triumphs, 627. Aſſiſts Cicero againſt Catiline, 632.
Luſitanians defeated by the Romans, 315. By Sempronius, 318. Defeat Mummius, 333. Treacherouſly treated by Cæpio, 364, & ſeq. Conquered, 366. By Brutus, 370.
—— make Sertorius their general, 595. Form a republick, 597. Greatly civilized by Sertorius, 598.
Lutatius Catulus's ſucceſs in Sicily, 151, & ſeq. Makes peace with Carthage, 154, & ſeq.
——Cerco's ſucceſs in Hetruria, 155.
Lutian youths puniſhed by Scipio, 373.
Luxury retrenched at Rome, 427. New laws againſt it, 445.

M

MAcedonia conquered by the Romans, 333, & ſeq. How governed from that time, 337. Acknowledge Andriſcus for king, 346. Reconquered by Metellus, 347.
Magius, a nobleman of Capua, friend to the Romans, 226. Sent by Hannibal in irons to Carthage, ibid. Driven into Egypt by a ſtorm, is kindly received by Ptolemy, ibid.

Mago surrenders new Carthage, 261. Defeated in his attempt againſt it, 275.

— brings the Carthaginians an account of his brother Hannibal's ſucceſs, 227. Lands in Liguria, 276. Defeated by the Romans, is wounded and dies, 287.

Mallius ſent againſt the Gauls, 476. Defeated, 477.

Mandonius petty king of Spain, defeated, 274. Sent priſoner to Acidinus, 277.

Manilian law paſſed in favour of Pompey, 625.

Manlius, one of Catiline's conſpirators, 628. Raiſes troops, 632. Proſcribed, 635. Killed, 640.

— L. Manlius, prætor in Gaul, 183. Ill ſucceſs againſt the Boii, 186.

— a ſenator, degraded for ſaluting his wife, 315.

Marcellus, M. Claudius, vid. Claudius, 177. — the ſon of Claudius's bravery, 267.

Marcia, the grove of, at Minturnæ, 539.

—, the wife of Regulus, her cruel revenge on the Carthaginians, 138.

Marcius Q. Rex's ſucceſs in Gaul, 426. Founds Narbonne, ibid.

—— Caius C. ſurprizes and burns the Carthaginian camp, 249. The ſenate's behaviour to him, 250. Scipio's regard for him, 259.

—— M. Philippus's ſucceſs in Macedonia, 323. Cruel terms to the Carthaginians, 329, & ſeq. Diſtreſſed by Aſdrubal, 343.

Marcus a freed-man of Marius, tortured to death by Catiline, 573.

Marian faction revived in Afric, 582. In Spain, ibid. & ſeq.

Marius Caius, his character, 424, & ſeq. Tribuneſhip, 425. Intrepidity, ibid. Prætorſhip, 426. Made Lieutenant to Metellus, 448. Ingratitude to him, 551. Defeats Jugurtha, 452. Treachery to Metellus, 455. Choſen conſul, 458. Inſolence to the patricians, 460. Lands in Afric, 462. Cruelty to the Numidians, 464. Dreadful ſlaughter of them, 468. Made proconſul of Afric, 469. Makes a truce with the Mauritanians, 470. Rancour againſt Sylla, 474. Continued procunſul of Numidia, 476. Second conſulſhip and ſecond triumph. 480. Strict diſcipline, 486. Inſtances of his equity, ibid. Third conſulſhip, 487. Fourth, how managed, ibid. His noble canal in Provence, 489. Succeſs againſt the Teutones, 490. Fifth conſulſhip, 495. Stern anſwer to the Cimbri, 496. Dreadful ſlaughter of them, 497. His triumph and temple, 498. Plots to enſlave his country, 501. Law againſt the ſenate, 502. Treachery to Metellus, 503. To the ſenate, 504. Upholds the rebels, 506. Withdraws into Pontus, 509. Inſolence to Mithridates, 509. Returns to Rome, 512. Mortified by Sylla, ibid. Defeated by the Marſi, 522. Oppoſes Sylla, 527. Choſen general againſt Mithridates, 529. Forced by Sylla out of Rome, 531. Proſcribed, 532. His dangerous flight and adventures, 533, & ſeq. Diſcovered and ſeized, 537. Releaſed by the Minturnenſes, 538. Imbarques for Ænania, 539. Repulſed by Sextilius, ibid. & ſeq. Proud anſwer to him, 540. Lands at Cercina, 541. Recalled by Cinna, 543. Joins with him, 544. Refuſes the proconſulſhip, ibid. Succeſs againſt the conſuls, 546, & ſeq. Repulſed at the Janiculum, 547. Cruel revenge in Rome, 550. Proſcriptions, butcheries, &c. 551. To M. Antonius, 552. Seventh conſulſhip, 554. Gives himſelf up to drinking, 555. Madneſs and death, ibid.

— the ſon of the former, dangerous eſcape, 534. Goes into Numidia, 540. Eſcapes from thence, ibid. & ſeq. Rejoins his father, 541. Imitates his cruelty, 555. Choſen conſul, ibid. Butchers Sylla's friends, 564. Defeated by him, ibid. Flies to Prænеſte, ibid. Prænеſte ſurrenders, and he is taken priſoner, 571.

— Egnatius, killed, 525.

Marriages among the Romans, new oaths appointed about them, 164.

Mars, the ſuppoſed appearance of, to the Roman army, 83, & n.

Marrucini, defeated by Sylla, 522.

Marſi in Italy who, 486. Oppoſed by Sylla, 487. Erect themſelves into a republic, 518, 519. Invaded by Rutilius, ibid. Defeated by Pompey, 523. Defeat, 525.

Marſian war, whence ſo called, 515.

Martha, a ſham conjureſs under Marius, 490.

Maſſiniſſa's ſucceſs againſt Syphax king of the Maſæſylians, 244. Againſt the Romans, and two Scipios in Spain, 247. Confers with Scipio, and enters into an alliance with the Romans, 272, 273, 274. Defeats the Carthaginians, and joins the Romans, 280, 281. Succeſs againſt Syphax, 284. Marries Sophoniſba, ibid. Forced to poiſon her, 286, His reward, ibid. & 294. War with Carthage, 336. Kind reception of Scipio Æmylianus, 337. Valour in his old age, ibid. Laſt victory, ibid.

Maſſiniſſa leaves his kingdom to his three ſons, 432.

Maſſiva begs the Numidian crown of the Romans, 443. Aſſaſſinated by Jugurtha, ibid.

Mauritania delivered by Sertorius, 594.

Mediolanum, taken by the Romans, 178.
Megalia taken by the Romans, 349.
Megallis, a cruel tyrant to her female ſlaves, 387. Her cruel death, 388.
Melita, the iſle of, plundered by the Romans, 120. Taken by them, 184.
Memmius Caius, accuſes Jugurtha, 437. His ſpeech to the committee, 441. Murdered by Equitius, 505.
Menius a plebeian, choſen dictator, 25, Submits to a trial, and acquitted, 26. Rechoſen dictator, 34.
Merula Cornelius's ſucceſs againſt the Gauls, 303.
— L. Cornel. choſen conſul, 543. Reſigns to Cinna, 549. His death, 553.
Metella Sylla's wife's happy eſcape, 551. Death, 583.
Metellus L. Cæcil. noble triumph over Aſdrubal, 134. Saves the palladium from the flames, 156, 157.
— choſen conſul, 422. Second conſulſhip, 427.
— Q. Cæcil. conquers Macedon, 323, & ſeq. Succeſs and generous behaviour in Spain, 358, & ſeq Recal and reſentment againſt his ſucceſſor, 361. Aſſaſſinated by Aſin. Labeo, 393. His character of Scipio Africanus, 395. Cruelty to the Balearians, 402.
— Caius Cæcil. ſucceſs in Macedon, 430. His character, 447, 448. March into Numidia, 448. Defeats Jugurtha, 449. Made proconſul of Numidia, 451, Beſieges Zama, 452. Supplanted by Marius, retakes Vacca, 455. Traduced by him, 456. Succeſs in Numidia, 460, & ſeq. Triumph at Rome, 462. Inſnared by Marius, 503. Baniſhed, 504. Biting farewel to Rome, ibid. Recalled, 508. Brave ſpeech to Sylla, 571, Ill ſucceſs againſt Sertorius, 597. Defeats Hertuteius, 607. And Perperna, 609. Forced into Gaul, ibid.
— Quint. Cæcil. his ſon choſen conſul, 509. Strict diſcipline, 511. Sent to defend the city, 546. Modeſt and brave behaviour, ibid. Retires into Africa, 548. Choſen conſul, 622. Oppoſes Pompey, 646. Seized by the tribune and ſent to priſon, ibid.
— Pius's ſucceſs againſt the conſuls, 564, 565.
Metilius's ſpeech againſt Fabius the prodictator, 212.
Meton's advice to the Tarentines rejected, 86, & n.
Metrobus a debauched actor, one of Sylla's favourites, 589.
Micipſa educates Jugurtha, 432.
— 's book of agriculture brought to Rome, 354, n.
Milliona taken by Poſthumius, 65.
Milo general of Pyrrhus confined to the caſtle of Tarentum, 90. Falls out with the inhabitants, 91. Delivers the city to the Romans, 92.
Minacius Magius's faithfulneſs to the Romans, 519, 520.
Minturnienſes high regard to diſtreſſed Marius, 538.
Minutius Tib. Augurin. choſen conſul, 48. Slain by the Samnites, 49.
— Rufus, choſen general of horſe, 208. Accuſes Fabius the dictator, 209. Diſobeys him, 211. Made equal to him, 212. In danger of a defeat is preſerved with his whole army, 213. Makes his ſubmiſſion to him, ibid. Killed by the Carthaginians, at the battle of Cannæ, 220.
Mithridates's embaſſy to Sertorius, 611. Treaty with him, 612.
Molon not the ſame with Apollonius, 603, n.
Moneta, money, ſilver, when firſt coined at Rome, 94. When firſt alloyed with copper, 225.
Morgantines treachery and ingratitude to the ſlaves, 485.
Mucia, the feſtival of, whence ſo called, 511.
— the incontinent wife of Pompey, divorced, 645.
Mucius Cordius choſen conſul, 371, & n.
Mulucha, the caſtle of, deſcribed, 465. Taken by Marius, ibid.
Mummius repulſed by the rebellious ſlaves, 618.
— 's ill ſucceſs in Luſitania, 333.
Murgantia taken from the Samnites, 56.
Muſic, concerts of, forbid at Rome, 427.
Mutilation firſt puniſhed at Rome, 494.
Mutina attempted by the Boii, 185. Relieved by L. Attilius. 186.
Myſiſtratum, after ſeveral attempts, taken by the Romans, 118.

N

NAbdalla's plots againſt Jugurtha, 457. diſcovered and pardoned, 458.
Nabis tyrant of Lacedæmon, forced to make peace with Rome, 303.
Nævius the poet, his works, 158.
Narbonne, by whom founded, 426.
Narbonnenſis Gaul, ravaged by the Cimbri, 446, 451.
Naſica Scipio Sp. Corn. his character, 430.

Neapolis, by whom built, 7. Plundered by Calpurnius, 547.
Nepheris taken by the Romans, 351.
Nequinium, a city of Umbria, described, 52. Betrayed to the Romans, ibid.
Nero T. opposes the sentence passed on the conspirators with Catiline, 637.
—— Claudius outreached by Asdrubal, 257, & seq. Chosen consul against Hannibal, 269. Success against him and Asdrubal, 270. Consul against the Carthaginians, 289.
Nertobrigia, the siege of, raised by Metellus's generosity, 360.
Nerva Licinius, prætor of Sicily bribed by the publicans against the slaves, 483. Defeated by Salvius, 484.
Nicomedes's just complaint against the Romans, 482. entertains Julius Cæsar, 586.
Nicopolis Sylla's generous courtezan, 466.
Nobiles among the Romans, who, 513, n.
Nola, taken from the Samnites, 34. Besieged by Hannibal, 235. Defended bravely by Marcellus, ibid. Battle of, 236.
——, taken by the allies, 512. Retaken by Sylla, 526. reduced by him, 586.
Nonnius stabbed by Apuleius, 501.
Norba, the dreadful catostrophe of, 572.
Norbanus C. Junius, marches against Sylla, 560. Affronts his deputies, 561. Defeated by him, ibid. By Metellus, 565. His escape and death, 566.
Novi, among the Romans, who, 513, n.
Nuceria, the revolt of, 482.
Numantia besieged, 372. Destroyed, 374.
Numantine war, the cause of, 362. The success of, ibid. & seq. —peace, 367. Broken, 369, & seq.
Numerius, Fab. triumphs over the Salentines, 95.
Numidia, how divided by the Romans, 476. Given to Hiempsal for opposing Marius, 583. taken away by Cæsar, 613.
Numidians abandon the Romans in the war with the allies, 521.
—— ravage Carthage, 125. Repulsed by the Gauls, 187. How they cut through the Alpine rocks, 191, & seq. Over-reach the Ligurians, 305.
Nutria taken by the Romans, 169.
Nymphius's stratagem against the Samnites, 9, 10.

O

Octavius chosen consul, 533. His excellent character, ibid. Repays Cinna's treachery in kind, and drives him out of the city, 425. Assassinated by Censorinus, 550.
—— Roman admiral, invests Samothrace, 325. Takes Perses prisoner, 326. Triumphs, 327. Assassinated in Syria, 329.
—— Mar. Cæcina, opposes the Sempronian law, 380.
Offella invests prænestе, 565. Taken, 571.
Ofilius, Calav. just opinion of the Romans, after passing under the yoke, 22.
Ogulnian laws, made in favour of the plebeians, 51.
Ogulnii, Quinct. and Cneius, stirred up in favour of the plebeians, 50.
Olbia taken by the Romans, 117.
Olcades, where situate, 179. Invaded by Hannibal, ibid.
Olympic games exhibited by Sylla, 582.
Opima spolia, the third, 178.
Opimius Luc. basely bribed by Jugurtha, 434. Cruel banishment, 445.
—— a Roman champion kills a Cimbrian in single combat, 495.
—— Q. Nepos's success in Transalpine Gaul, 332.
—— L. chosen consul against Gracchus, 411. Seizes the Capitol, 413. Besieges the revolters, 415. Cruelty to the Gracchian faction, 417, & seq. To young Fulvius, 418. Builds a temple to concord, ibid. Tried and acquitted, 421, 422.
Oppian law, what, 300. Repealed, 301.
Oppius Spur. defeated by the Boii, 296.
Orcian law, what, 317.
Orestes Aurel. chosen consul, 486. death, 487.
—— Aufidius, chosen consul, 618.
Oroscopa besieged by Masinissa, 356.
Osca, where situate, 589, n.
Ostia, taken and plundered by Marius, 547.
Otacilius's election opposed, 238. Sent into Sicily, ibid.
Oxyntas released by Aponius, 521.

P

PAcianus, defeated by Sertorius, 595.
Painting, first brought to Rome, by Fobius, firnamed Pictor, 50.
Palæpolitans invade the Romans, 7. Surrender to them, 9, & seq.
Palladium, saved from the flames by Metellus, 157.
Palma, by whom built, 402.
Palumbinum taken by Corvilius, 70.
Panormus taken by the Romans, 130.
Papirius

Papirius Craſſus choſen dictator, 4.

——— Curſor choſen dictator, 12. Severity to Fabius, ibid. Pardons him, 14. Alters his conduct to the army, 15. Choſen dictator, over-runs Samnium and obtains a triumph, 16. Second conſulate, 23. Defeats the Samnites, 27. In Apulia, 28. Triumphs, 29. His character, ibid. Second dictatorſhip, 42. Triumphs over the Samnites, 44. His death, ibid.

——— the ſon of Curſor, ſent againſt the Samnites, 68. Stratagem and ſucceſs againſt them, 69, & ſeq. Totally defeats them, ibid. & ſeq.

——— Carbo's tryal, 423. Death, 424.

——— Cneius, defeated by the Cimbri, 430.

——— Carbo joins with Cinna and Marius, 545. Choſen conſul by the faction, 556. Raiſes an army againſt Sylla, 560. Deſerted by the quæſtor, 561. His judgment of Sylla, 562. Vain attempt to relieve Marius, 563. Tyrannic conſulſhip, ibid. Defeated by Sylla, 565. Flight to Africa, 566. Proſcribed by Sylla, 573. Ungratefully put to death by Pompey, 575, 576.

——— Carbo, brother to the conſul murdered, 564.

Parricide, firſt puniſhed at Rome, 494.

Patricians, over-powered by Tib. Gracchus, 378, & ſeq.

Patrons at Rome, their office, 30, n.

Pœtus P. Autron. conſpires with Catiline, 628.

Peligni defeated by Serv. Pulpit. 522.

Perpena, a ſoldier, choſen conſul, 393.

Perperna, defeated by the Allies, 520. Forced to abandon Sicily, 575. Paſſes into Spain, 605. Forced to join Sertorius in Luſitania, ibid. Repulſed by Pompey, 607. Defeated by Metellus, 609. Treachery to Sertorius, 614. Takes on him the command of his army, 616. Defeated, taken and put to death by Pompey, ibid.

Perſes's treachery to Eumenes, 320. Gains ſome advantages over the Romans, 321, & ſeq. Inactivity while Manlius opens a way into Macedon, ibid. Defeated by Æmilius, 325. Surrenders himſelf to the Romans, 326. His cowardice, 327. Led in triumph, ibid. & ſeq. His miſerable end, 328.

Petilia taken by Hannibal, 232.

Petilius's inveteracy againſt the two Scipios, 310, & ſeq. Killed by the Ligurians, 319.

Petreius's bravery rewarded, 495.

Phameas a Carthaginian general, brought over to the Romans, 346.

Pharos, iſland, taken by the Romans, 180.

——— city razed by them, ibid.

Phaſelli, pyrates whence ſo called, 612, n.

Philip, king of Macedon, allies with Hannibal, 235. Beſieges and takes Oricum, 242. Defeated by Levinus, ibid. Solicits the ſtates of Aſia to join him, 296. Defeated by Flaminius, 298. Sues for peace, ibid. Submits to the decree of the Roman commiſſaries, 314.

Philippus Luc. Marc. choſen conſul, 515. Oppoſes Druſus's ſcheme, 516. Sent to priſon, 517. Suſpected of aſſaſſinating Druſus, ibid. & ſeq.

——— Lucius's motion in favour of Pompey, 600.

Philo Q. Publ. choſen conſul, marches againſt the Palæpolitans, 8. The firſt who triumphs, in an inferior ſtation, 10. Choſen conſul, a third time, 23.

Philonides's affront to Poſthumius, 84.

Picentes conquered by Cornelius Sophus, 94.

Pileus at Rome, to whom given, 409, n.

Piſo comes over to Sylla, 561 Forced to divorce his beloved Annia, 585.

——— Calpurn. ſpeech againſt Pompey, 623.

——— conſpires with Catiline, 628.

Pius Metellus's ſon, whence ſo ſirnamed, 508.

Placentia put to the ſword, 297.

Plætorius Marc. put to death for his compaſſion, 573.

Plautius M. Silvan's wholeſome laws, 524.

——— L. Venno, made conſul, 5. Succeſs againſt the Privernates, 6. Obtains their pardon, 7.

Plebeians, triumphs over the Patricians, 481.

——— procure new laws in their favour, 320, & ſeq. Raiſe new mutinies, 79. Raiſed to the conſulate, 320. To the cenſorſhip, 592.

Pliſtia taken by the Samnites, 31.

Plotius, C. an uſurer, his cruelty to Veturius, 79. Condemned to death, ibid.

Po river, its golden ſand, 359.

Pollentia, by whom built, 402.

Polybius accompanies Scipio Æmilius, 348.

Pompedius, general of the Marſi, diverted from invading Rome, 518. Outwits and defeats the great Scipio, 520. Defeated and killed, 528.

Pompeii, the city of, taken by Sylla, 525.

Pompeiopolis, whence ſo called, 625.

Pompeia, Cæſar's wife's incontinency, 542.

Pompeius Cneius, defeated by the allies, 519. Whence ſirnamed Stabo, 523. Victor over the Marſi, ibid. Severity to the Aſculans, 526. Triumphs over them, 527. Subdues the Veſtini, 528. Succeſs againſt the allies, 541. Treachery to Rufus, ibid. Outwits the ſenate, 543. Goes over to the conſuls, 545, 547. His life ſaved by his ſon, 547. Killed by lightning, ibid.

— Rufus, aſſaulted by Sulpitius, 528.

— depoſed, 529. Seizes the Collinum gate, 530. Undermined by Pomp. Strabo, 541. Murdered, ibid.

Pompey the great born, 476. His firſt campaign, 547. Saves his father's life, ibid. Firſt ſucceſs againſt the conſuls, 565. In Sicily, 575. Ingratitude and cruelty to Carbo, ibid. His clemency to the Sicilians, 576. Succeſs in Africa, 582. Whence ſirnamed the Great, 583. Bold anſwer to Sylla, 584. Obtains a triumph, 585. Oppoſes Sylla, 588. Defeats Lepidus, 591. And Brutus, ibid. Made governor of Luſitania, 601. Paſſes thither, 604, 605. Foiled by Sertorius, 605, & ſeq. Defeated and wounded, 607. In great danger, ibid. Defeated afreſh, 609. His doleful letter to the ſenate, 610. Puts an end to the Spaniſh war, 617. Puts Perperna to death, 616. Defeats the rebels, 619. Choſen conſul, 620. Reconciled to Craſſus, 621. Extenſive power againſt the pyrates, 623. Quick ſucceſs againſt them, 625. His over-grown power by ſea and land, ibid. & ſeq. Groſs diſſimulation, 627. Sumptuous triumph, 644. Generoſity to his captives, ibid. His rivals, 645. Wrong politicks, ibid. Hatred to Cæſar, ibid. Reconciled to him, 648.

— Quinct. ſent into Spain, 361. Ill conduct there, 362.

Pomponius Matho triumphs over the Sardinians, 166. Made prætor of it, 167.

Pontifices augmented by Sylla, 579.

Pontius, the Samnite general's ſtratagem againſt the Romans, 17, 18. Rejects his father's wholeſome advice, 19. Reduces them to a ſhameful peace, 20. Reproves their known faithleſneſs, 24. Defeated, 26, 27. Forced to paſs under the yoke, 28. Defeats Fabius Gurges, but is defeated by Fabius Maximus, 71, 72. Led in triumph, and beheaded, 76.

— Herennius defeated, 72.

Popilius, made to paſs under the yoke, 459.

— Lænas, ſeverity to the Stelliates, 319. Condemned by the ſenate, ibid.

Poſthumius Spur. choſen conſul, 17. Shameful expedition againſt the Samnites, ibid. & ſeq. Forced to paſs under the yoke, 21. Delivered up to the Samnites, 23. Releaſed by Pontius, 24.

— Megillus, choſen conſul, 48. Defeats the Samnites, ibid. Succeſsful diverſion in Hetruria, &c. 61. Againſt Samnium, 65. Hetruria, 67. Affronted by the Tarentines, 84.

— L. a haughty conſul, 73. His ſucceſs in Hetruria, 75. Mortified by the ſenate, 76.

— A. conſul and prieſt, 151.

— Albinus's ſucceſs in Illyricum, 168, & ſeq. Recalled, 169. Killed by the Boii, 233.

— Albinus, poiſoned by his wife, 331.

Potitii puniſhed by Hercules, 35.

Præneſte invaded by Sylla, 565. Surrendered, 571. Totally ruined, ibid.

Prænestines cruelly butchered by Sylla, 571.

Prætors, taken from among the plebeians, 3.

—Peregrinus, when firſt created, 151. His office, ibid.

Preſenteius's ſucceſs againſt the Romans, 520.

Principes, among the Romans, whence ſo called, 655.

Privateers, firſt allowed by the Romans, 147. Shipwrecked, 149.

Privernum, revolts from them, 5. Retaken 6. Made a municipal city, 7.

Prodictators, why choſen by the Romans, 208,

Proletarii, who, 88. Inrolled in the army, ibid.

Ptolemy Philadelphus's embaſſy to Rome, 90.

Publicans, when firſt created at Rome, 156.

Publilius, a plebeian, choſen prætor, 3. Triumphs over Palæpolis, 10.

— a young ſlave, cruelly uſed by Papirius, 11.

Publipot, defeated by Pompey, 619.

Publius Malleolus's puniſhment for parricide, 494.

Pullus Junius choſen conſul, 142. Sails to the ſiege of Lilybæum, 144. Suffers a dreadful ſhipwreck, 145. Surprizes Eryx, 145. His death, ibid.

Punic war, the cauſes of, 100, & ſeq. Ended, 163, & ſeq. Renewed, 182, & ſeq. Concluded, 292, & ſeq. Third, proclaimed, 339.

Puteoli regulated by Sylla, 589.

Pyrates take J. Cæſar priſoner, 602. Crucified by him, 603. Cauſe a famine in Rome, 606. Defeated by Servilius, 612. Whence called Phaſelii, ibid. n. Defeat M. Antony, 613. Supported by Mithridates, dates, 622. Their ſtrength and horrid cruelties, ibid. & ſeq.

Pyreneans ſubmit to Scipio, 214.
Pyrrhus invited by the Tarentines, 86. His arrival, 88.

Q

Quæſtors, provincial, inſtituted, 96. Their limits, ibid.
Quinctius Criſpinus, choſen conſul, 266. Surprized and wounded, 267. Death, 269.
— Lælius, choſen conſul, 304.
— a ſenator, degraded, 315.
— defeated by Lucullus, 566.
Quintus Lutat. Catulus, ſee Catulus, 487, n.
Quinqueremes, a fleet of, built by the Romans, 151.
Quirinus, the temple of, built by Papirius, 70, n.

R

Rediculus, a god, why ſo called, 254, n.
Revenue at Rome, how regulated, 96.
Rhegians murdered by the Campanians, 92.
Rings, whether worn by any but Roman knights, 227, n. Three buſhels of them ſent by Hannibal to Carthage, ibid.
Romans hemmed in by the Samnites, 18. Forced to paſs under the yoke, 21. Retaliate the ſame to them, 28. Their firſt war with Carthage, 100, & ſeq. New-built fleet, 110. Shipwrecked, 130. Make peace with Carthage, 153. War with Illyricum, 167. Make a new treaty with Carthage, 170. Act a piece of ſuperſtitious butchery, 171. Raiſe a vaſt army againſt the Gauls, ibid. Delivered by Æmilius, 172, & ſeq. Complaint againſt Hannibal rejected, 182. Cauſes a new war with Carthage, ibid. & ſeq. Defeat their fleet, 184. Surprized by the Carthaginians, 187. Defeated by them, 195. Maſſacred by the Gauls, 196, & ſeq. Defeated by Hannibal, 200. At Thraſymenus, 206, & ſeq. In Apulia, 219, & ſeq. Surrender on hard terms, 221. Why not redeemed by the ſenate, 225, & n. War againſt Perſes, 320. Injuſtice to Demetrius, 328, & ſeq. Letter to him, 329. Ill ſucceſs in Spain, 332. Third war with Carthage, 339. Demand the demolition of it, 341, & ſeq. Ill ſucceſs againſt it, 343, & ſeq. And in Spain, 345. Cauſe Carthage to be deſtroyed, 356. Ill luck in Spain, 359, & ſeq. Treachery to Viriathus, 364. Defeated by the Numidians, 366, 367. Treachery to them, 368. Diſturbed by the Gracchian faction, 380, & ſeq.
— invaded by the Cimbri, 429, & ſeq. Eighty thouſand killed by them, 477. War againſt Jugurtha, 433, & ſeq. Defeated in Luſitania, 478. Terrified at the ſecond approach of the Cimbri, 494. Defeated by the allies, 520. By the Marſi, 522.
Rome, under a general mourning, 22. A new cenſus taken, 30. Severe plague, 71. A freſh cenſus, 78, 90. Embaſſy to the king of Egypt, ibid. Puniſhment of the Campanians, 92, & ſeq. Extent of its territories taken, 95. A freſh peſtilence, 98. Third war with Carthage, 100, & ſeq. A new cenſus, 133. And fleet built, 134. Inhabitants diminiſhed, by 86,675, 148. Overflowed, and burnt, 156. In great dread of Hannibal, 207. Her ſtreets, when firſt paved, 319. A new cenſus, 328. In an uproar from the Gracchi, 415.
—, the hiſtory of, from the Graccian faction, 422, & ſeq. A new cenſus, 427. In utmoſt conſternation from the Gauls, 478. Purified and how, 507. Blocked up by Cinna, 545. Suffers a famine, 548. Opens her gates to Sylla, 565. Invaded by the Samnites, 567. Saved by Craſſus, 569. Made a ſhambles of by Sylla, 572. Inſlaved by him, 576. Reſtored by his abdication, 587. In danger from Lepidus, 590. Under a new famine, 606. A new cenſus, 621.
Romulea taken and put to the ſword, 56.
Roſcius, a companion of Sylla's debaucheries, 589.
Roſtrata, the column of Duilius, deſcribed, 115, n.
Rufinus Cornel. a ſenator, 90.
Runſius P. Cornelius, degraded, 466.
Rupilius Publius, quells the Sicilian rebels, 391. His code of Sicilian laws, ibid.
Ruſella taken by Poſthumius, 67.
Ruſbeck's whimſical notion of the Atlantis, 594, n.
Rutilius's ſucceſs againſt Jugurtha, 450. Supplanted by Scaurus, 459, n.
— Rufus, raiſes an army againſt the Gauls, 479. Unjuſtly baniſhed, 514.
— P. Lupus, choſen conſul, 518. Defeated and killed, 520.

S

Saguntum, the ſad cataſtrophe of 181. Rebuilt by Hannibal, 214.
Salapia, taken by the Romans, 258.
Salona, where ſituate, 423, & n.

Salentines ſubdued by Volumnius, 46. By Attilius Regulus, 95.
Salinator Jul. ſent to guard the Pyrenne, 592. Murdered by Calpurnius, ibid.
Salvius choſen king of the ſlaves, 484. Treathery to Athenio, 485. Cowardly flight out of the capitol, and death, 499.
Salyes ſubdued by the Romans, 402.
Samnites haughty anſwer to the Romans, 8. Shamefully over-reached at Palæpolis, 9, 10. Defeated by Fabius, 12. By Craſſus, 16. By Fabius, ibid. Force the Romans to a ſhameful peace, 20, & ſeq. Defeated by Lentulus, 27. By Papirus, 28. In Apulia, ibid. Twice more by Fabius, 31. Loſe thirty thouſand men, 34. By other conſuls, 44, & ſeq. Ally with Rome, 49. Driven out of their country, 57. Slaughtered by Fabius, 62, & ſeq. Oath given to their army, 67. Totally defeated, 70. Ally with Rome, 77. Defeated by Fabricius, 83. Quite aboliſhed, 91.
—— defeated by Sylla, 525, & ſeq. Bought over by Marius, 546. March to Rome, 567. Succeſs againſt Sylla, ibid. & ſeq. Defeated by Craſſus, 569. Their miſerable end, 570.
Samnium entered by J. Cæſar, 519.
Sarcinates in Umbria conquered by the Romans, 95.
Sardinia conquered by the Romans, 117, Seized by the Carthaginians, 160. Recovered, 161. Made a Roman province, 164. Regained by the Carthaginians, 167.
Saticula, taken by the Romans, 30, & ſeq.
Scævola Muc. ſee Mucius, 511.
Scaurus Æmil. choſen conſul, 427. Succeſs in Gaul, ibid. Sent againſt Jugurtha, 436. Baſely bribed by him, 437. Goes with Beſtia againſt him, 439. Named commiſſioner to enquire into Jugurtha's bribery, 445. Severity againſt his accomplices, ibid.
—— the noble conſul wounded by the mob, 478. Severity to his own ſon, 494.
—— M. Aurel. choſen conſul, 450. Defeated and taken priſoner by the Gauls, 477. His ſeaſonable advice to them, 480. Stabbed by Bojorix, ibid.
Scenes, painted, when firſt introduced, 508.
Scipio Cornel. ſucceſs againſt the Hetrurians, 54. Commands the Roman fleet, 11. Taken by the Carthaginians, ibid.
—— Lucius Cornel. commands the Roman fleet, 116. Takes Corſica and Sardinia, 117. Honoured with a triumph, 118. Outwitted by Hannibal in Gaul, 187, & ſeq. Returns into Italy, 193. Wounded and defeated by the Carthaginians, 195. Saved by his ſon, ibid. Paſſes the Trebia, 197. Retires to Placentia, 200. Sent proconſul into Spain, 201. Joins his brother there, 241. Set at liberty the Spaniſh hoſtages, 214. Defeats the Carthaginians, 228. Their ſucceſs there, ibid. 242. Engages Syphax in the Roman camp, 244. Defeated and killed, 247, & ſeq.
—— ſent conſul into Aſia, 307. Defeats Antiochus at Magneſia, 308. Obtains the name of Aſiaticus, ibid. Tried, 312. His poor effects confiſcated, 313. Reduced to poverty, ibid. Inriched, ibid. Degraded by the cenſor, out of hatred to his family, 315.
—— ſent proconſul into Spain, 258. Takes and plunders new Carthage, 260. His wonderful continence, 261. Drives the Carthaginians out of Spain, 266. His victory at Bœtica, 272. Allies with Syphax, 273, & ſeq. With Maſiniſſa, 274. Recalled, 275. Choſen conſul and ſent into Sicily, 275, 276. Imbarques for Africa, 278. His ſucceſs and ſevere diſcipline, 279. Proconſulſhip lengthened during the war, 282. Burns the camps of Syphax and Aſdrubal, ibid. Amuſed by the Carthaginians, 286. Ravages their country, 288. Interview with Hanniba', 289. Defeats him, 291, & ſeq. Propoſes peace on the hardeſt terms, 292. Accepted, ibid. & ſeq. Triumphs, and is ſirnamed Africanus, 295. Diſobliges the plebeians, 304, & ſeq. Serves under his brother, 307. Proſecuted by the plebeians, 310, & ſeq. His death, 312.
—— choſen conſul, 560. Surprized and releaſed by Sylla, 561, 562. Deſerted by his army, 562. Proſcribed by Sylla, 573.
—— Æmilianus, or younger Africanus's noble ſpeech to the Romans, 335. Gallantry in Spain, ibid. Comes to Maſiniſſa, 337. Saves the Roman army, 344. Relieves four Manipuli ſurrounded by the enemy, 345. Great ſucceſs in Afric, 346. Choſen conſul, 348. Succeſs againſt the Carthaginians, 351, & ſeq. Againſt Carthage, 352, & ſeq. Takes and utterly razes it, 335, & ſeq. Triumphs over it, 336. Sent againſt the Numantines, 370. Deſtroys and triumphs over them, 375. His ſweet retirement with Lælius, 393. Murdered, 395. His character, ibid. & ſeq.
—— Cn. Scipio ſent againſt Aſdrubal, 193. Succeſs in Spain, 204, & ſeq. 214.
—— Lucius, brings joyful Tidings to Rome, 271.
—— Hiſpalis dies of an Apoplexy, 319.
—— Naſica's ſucceſs in Luſitania, 303. Triumphs over the Boii, 306. Oppoſes Caſeq. Affronted by the Carthaginians, 331.

334. Fury againſt Gracchus, 384. His death, 386.

—— Naſica, ſee Naſica, 438.

Scordiſci, Defeat the Romans, 428. Defeated by Metellus, 430. Repaſs the Danube, 431. Defeated by Marius, 441.

Segeſtani reduced, 423, & n.

Sempronia's treachery to her huſband, 395.

Sempronian law, what, 377. New troubles raiſed about it, 394.

Sempronius Sophus's ſucceſs againſt the Æqui, 50. Subdues the Picentes after a bloody fight, 94.

—— Balæſus's triumph over Sicily, 132.

—— Tuditanus ſent to ſeize on Sardinia, 160. Succeſs in Gaul, 244. Repulſed by Hannibal, 278. Defeats him, 279. Killed by the Spaniards, 299.

—— Tib. Longus, defeats the Carthaginians at ſea, 184. Sent againſt Hanibal, ibid. Joins Cornelius Scipio, 198. Defeated, 200. Bold journey to Rome, ibid. & ſeq.

—— Tib. Gracchus, choſen conſul, 233. Defeats the Campanians, 235. Saves Beneventum. 239. Defeats the Carthaginians with an army of Volones, ibid. Betrayed and murdered, 246. His body burnt with great honour by Hannibal, 247.

Senate, Roman, partiality to Jugurtha, 437. Their power curtailed, 481. Threatened by Marius's faction, 502. Send a deputation to Sylla, 559. Cowardice towards Pompey, 623, & ſeq.

Senators degraded for Luxury, 90. A new ſet of them raiſed, 232.

—— murdered by Marius, 551. Forty of them proſcribed by Sylla, 472. Butchered by Catiline, ibid. & ſeq. & 586. Six hundred and forty of them degraded by Catulus, 621.

Senones, defeat a Roman legion, 61. Defeated by M. Livius, ibid. Murder the Roman deputies, 82. Defeated and utterly deſtroyed, ibid.

Sepinum taken by the Romans, 70.

Sergia, a priſoner at Rome, put to death, 5.

Sertorius, ſaves himſelf in his firſt campaign againſt the Gauls, 478. Signalizes himſelf in Spain, 510. And againſt the allies, 520. Againſt Cinna, 545. Advances againſt Marius, 546. Proſcribed by Sylla, 573. Succeſs in Spain, 592. Forced from thence into Afric, 593. Shipwrecked, ibid. Succeſs in Mauritania, 594. Returns into Spain, heads the Luſitanians, 595. Gains on their ſuperſtitions, ibid. & ſeq. Succeſs againſt Pompey, 606, & ſeq. Defeats him, 607. Contemptuous Sarcaſms on him, 606, 608. Gives him a ſecond defeat, 609. Forced by Metellus to quit the field, 609. Drives the two Generals out of Spain, 610. His filial love, ibid. Glorious treaty with Mithridates, 611. Conſpired againſt, 613. Severity to the Luſitanian hoſtages, 614. Excuſed by Plutarch, ibid. n. Aſſaſſinated, 616.

Servilia, Cato's ſiſter, love-letters to J. Cæſar, 637, n.

Servilius C. defeated by the Slaves, 500.

—— murdered by the Aſculans, 319.

—— P. Vatia, choſen conſul, 580.

—— P. defeats the pyrates and is ſirnamed Iſauricus, 612.

Sextius Tullius's ſubdues the Salyes, 402.

Sibylline books collected by Sylla, 579. An account of them, ibid. n.

Sibyls, who and how many, 579, n. & ſeq n.

Sicily laid waſte by the Slaves, 484, & ſeq. 488. Subdued by Pompey, 575.

—— invaded by the Romans, 106, & ſeq. Yielded to them, 153. Made a Roman province, 155. A new revolt in it, 387, & ſeq.

Sicinius, a buffooning tribune, baffled, 601. Aſſaſſinated, 602.

Sidenci, conquered by the Romans, 3.

Silanus's ſucceſs in Spain, 272. Treats with Maſiniſſia, 273.

—— defeated in Gaul, 446. Choſen conſul, 637. Condemns the conſpirators, ibid.

Slaves, their third conſpiracy diſcovered by Errius, 116.

—— inliſted into the army, 224. Raiſe a rebellion in Sicily, 387.

—raiſe a new war, 482.—in Sicily, their deſperate end, 484. Defeated by Licinius, 499. Leave their maſters ſervice and join Cinna, 548. Butcher the Romans, 550. 10,000 made Roman citizens by Sylla, 581. Raiſe a new revolt in Italy, 617. Defeated by Craſſus, 619.

Solduri among the Gauls what, 599, n.

Sophoniſba, her character, 278. Betrothed to Maſiniſſa is given to Syphax, ibid. Marries Maſiniſſa, 284. Drinks the poiſon ſent by him, 286.

Sora taken by the Romans, 32.

Sorex, a companion of Sylla's, 589.

Spain totally reduced by Scipio, 275. Made a Roman province, 299. Revolts. ibid. Recovered by Metellus, 360.

Spartacus, head of the Capuan ſlaves, 617. Defeats the conſuls, ibid. His courage and conduct, 618. Defeated and killed, 619.

Spoletum effects of, confiſcated by Sylla, 574.
Spoliarium among the Romans, what, 408, n.
Stabiæ taken by Sylla, 525.
Stæni, where ſituate, 426. Their deſperate end, ibid.
Statius Gellius the Samnite general, taken priſoner by the Romans, 49.
Stelliates ſubdued by the Romans, 319.
Sthenis's brave anſwer to Pompey, 576.
Suffeius adviſes Apuleius to burn the capitol, 506. His death, 507.
Suffrages, a new law paſſed about them, 481.
Sulmona confiſcated by Sylla, 574.
Sulpitia, a lady famed for her chaſtity, 429.
Sulpitius P. his ſad character, 527. Popular laws, ibid. Treacherous attempt on the conſuls, 528. Proſcribed and beheaded by Sylla, 532.
—— Servius, ſubdues the Marricini, 525.
—— Suverro ſubdues the Æqui, 249.
—— Paterculus defeats Hannibal at ſea, 119.
—— Galba choſen conſul againſt the Macedonians, 296.
Swizzers, invade Gallia Norban, 476. Ravage Italy, 489.
Sylla ſent into Numidia, 465. His character, ibid. & ſeq. Change in his conduct, 466. Bravery, 468. Made proquæſtor, 469. Whence ſirnamed Fortunate, 471. Interview with Bocchus, ibid. Succeſs in Gaul, 482. Gains over the Marſi, 487. Rivals Marius at Rome, 512. Public ſhews, 514. Receives an embaſſy from Arbaces, ibid. Defeats the Marrucini, 522. Baffles the allies, 525. Beats the Samnites, 526. His conſulſhip and triumph, 526. Forced to leave Rome, 529. Comes with an army againſt it, ibid. Enters it by force, 531. His new laws, ibid. Diſpleaſes the ſenate, 532. Perſecutes Marius, 523. Gives an account of his conduct, ſails for Aſia, 542. Proſcribed, 551. Succeſs againſt Mithridates, 554. Expoſtulatory letter, to the ſenate, ibid. Marches againſt Fimbria, 558. Anſwers to the ſenate, 559. Lands in Italy, 560. Outwits Scipio, 561. Defeats young Marius, 564. Enters Rome, 565. Defeats the conſuls in ſeveral fights, ibid. Defeated by the Samnites, 568. His cruel revenge on them, 570. Speech to the ſenate, ibid. Cruelty to the Prænestines, 571. Horrid proſcriptions and butcheries, 572. Made perpetual dictator, 577. His new laws, ibid. & ſeq. Threatning ſpeech, 578. Magnificent triumphs, 581. Title of Fortunate, 582, & n. Grows jealous of Pompey, 583. Profuſe conſulſhip, 583. Marries Valeria, 584. Envy againſt J. Cæſar, 585. Lays down his dictatorſhip, 587. His ſpeeeh to young Pompey, 588. Debauched life, 589. Death and character, 589. Funeral honours, 590. Epitaph, ibid.
—— P. Cornel. conſpires with Catiline, 628.
Syphax defeated by the Maſſylians, 244. Allies with Rome, 273. Declares war againſt it, 281, & ſeq. Defeated by Scipio, 282. Defeated by Maſiniſſa, and taken priſoner, 284. Whether led in triumph, 295.
Syracuſans, invaded by the Romans, 105, & ſeq.
Syrians, defeated by the Romans, 306. Fifty thouſand killed by Scipio Aſiaticus, 308.

T

TAbles, how regulated at Rome, 445.
Talabriſia ſurrendered to the Romans, 367.
Tantalus defeated by the Romans, 366.
Tarentines, their extraction, and character, 81, & ſeq. Raiſe freſh enemies, againſt the Romans, ibid. & ſeq. Hoſtilities againſt them, 84. Inſult their embaſſadors, ibid. Take Thurium, 85. Invite Pyrrhus to their defence, 86. Subdued by Papyrius Curſor, 92. By Fabius, 264. Their miſerable ſtate, ibid.
Tarentum, whence ſo called, 81. Diſmantled by the Romans, 92. Betrayed to Hannibal, 244. Retaken by Fabius, 264. Pictures and ſtatues not taken away, ibid.
Tarquins accuſation of Craſſus, as guilty in Catiline's conſpiracy, 636. Declared to be ſuborned and perjured, ibid.
Taurinum taken by Hannibal, 192.
Taurominium delivered up to the Romans, 104. Seized by the revolted ſlaves, 390. Retaken by Rutilius, ibid.
Taurisci ravaged by the Cimbrians, 429.
Tectoſages, their treaſure, whether the plunder of Delphos, 475. Defeated by Sylla, 482.
Teleſinus Pont. joins the Marian faction, 567. Outwits Sylla, ibid. Marches to Rome, ibid. Defeats Sylla, 568. Defeated and killed, 569, 570.
Tellus, the temple of, built by Semproſius Sophus, 94, n.
Temples at Rome, ſtripped by Carbo, 563.
Terence the poet taken captive, 295. In high eſteem, 328. His plays attributed to Scipio Æmilianus, 348.

Terentius Varro, ſides with Minutius, againſt Fabius Maximus, 212. Choſen conſul againſt Hannibal, 215. Defeated horſe and foot, 218, & ſeq. Flies to Venuſia, 219. To Canuſium, 222. Favoured and received at Rome, and thanked by the ſenate, 224.

Termantians defeat the Romans, 362.

Teuta, queen of Illyricum murders the Roman embaſſadors, 168. Invaded by the conſuls, ibid. Makes a ſhameful peace with them, 169.

Teutoboccus defeated by Marius, and ſlain 492, 493. His gigantic ſtature, 493, n. & 493.

Teutones invade Italy, 429. Their taunts to the Roman army, 490. Above 100,000 killed by Marius, 492, 493.

Tezaga taken by Scipio Æmilianus, 346, & n.

Thala, taken by the Romans, 460, 461.

Thermus's ſtratagem againſt the Ligurians, 304, & ſeq. Defeats them, 305.

Theſſaly ſubdued by Acilius, 306. By Æmilius, 324. By the Macedonians, 346.

Tholus taken by Syphax, 281.

Thracians invade Macedonia, 488.

Thraſymenus, the battle of, 206, & ſeq.

Thurium taken by the Tarentines, 85.

Tiber, its overflowing, 156.

Tiguri, defeat the Romans, 459.

Tingis, Tanginer, taken by Sertorius, 595.

Titinius Caius, betrays the revolted ſlaves, 484.

Titius Sextus, baniſhed, 508.

Toloſa, taken and plundered by the Romans, 475.

Towers for ſieges, by whom invented, 3.

Trebatius defeated by Coſconius, 525.

Trebonius rewarded by Marius, 486.

Triballi, where ſituate, 440, n. Defeated by the Romans, 441.

Tribes at Rome, two more added, 4. Augmented to thirty one, 29. The laſt augmentation of them, 157. All but one diſfranchiſed, 180.

Tribunes obtain ſeats in the ſenate, 394.

—— Sylla's laws againſt, 578. Humbled by Curio, 601. Recover their power, 606.

—— legionary, what, 37, n.

Triocala, made the capitol of the revolted ſlaves, 485.

Triventum, taken by the Romans, 65.

Triumvirs, a new choice for the Sempronian law, 381.

—— Capitales, their office, 78.

Triumvirate firſt, and by whom hatched, 648.

Troſſulum taken by the Romans, 70.

Tudætani in Spain made ſlaves, 242.

Turpilius, betrayed by the Vaccans, 454, Unjuſtly put to death, 455.

Tunis taken by the Romans, 124. By Scipio, 283.

Tutia, a veſtal, condemned to death, 165.

V

Vacca, taken by Metellus, 448. Betrayed to Jugurtha, and the Romans maſſacred, 454. Retaken, 459.

Vaccæi, defeated by Fulvius, 303. By Sempronius, 318. Defeat Lepidus, 369.

Valentia, the colony of, when and by whom ſettled, 366.

Valeria, married to Sylla, 584.

Valerius Corvus, Rechoſen conſul, nem. con. 53. His death and character, ibid.

—— Manlius Flaccus triumphs over Sicily, 105, & ſeq.

—— Falto, choſen firſt prætor peregrinus, 151. Defeated by the Gauls, 159.

Vardei ſubdued by Flaccus, 373.

Vectones defeated by Fulvius, 303.

Ventidius P. an infant led in triumph, 527.

Venus Eryca, the temple of 149.

—— Verticordia, the temple of, whence ſo called, 429.

Venuſium taken and colonied by the Romans, 75, & ſeq.

Ver ſacrum, what, 208.

Verres comes over to Sylla, 561.

Veſta the temple of, at Rome, burnt, 156.

Veſtals, puniſhed for incontinence, 428,

Veſtini, ſubdued by the Romans, 12.

Vetilius defeated and killed by the Luſitanians, 345, 346.

Vettius raiſes a revolt at Capua, 482. His death, 483.

—— Cato's victory over the Romans, 520. Defeated by Pompey, 525. Betrayed and ſtabbed, 528.

Veturius T. choſen conſul, ſhamefully defeated by the Samnites, 18, & ſeq.

—— his ſon ſubmits to ſlavery to diſcharge his father's debts, 79. Cruelly treated by Plotius, ibid.

Vibius, a brave exploit of his, 245.

Victumviæ taken by Hannibal, 202.

Villian law received at Rome, 317.

Vindelicia, where ſituate, 429, n.

Viriathus defeats the Romans, 345. Defeated by Fabius, 358. Obliges the Romans mans to make peace, 363. Gains advantages over Q. Pompeius, 360. Defeats the conſul Servilianus, 362. Forces him to make peace, 363. The injuſtice of the Romans towards him, 364. Forced by them to take up arms, 365. Treacherouſly murdered by Cæpio, ibid.

Virius's deſperate advice to the Capuans, 356.

Vixerunt, the word to ſignify they are dead, 638.

Umbria, invaded by the Romans, 42.

Umbrians join in the ſocial war, 522. Defeated, 523.

Volana taken by the Romans, 70.

Vœlaterro, reduced by Sylla, 586.

Volones, ſlaves, whence ſo called, 224.

Volſcini, Oppreſſed by the freemen, 99. Taken and razed, ibid.

Volumnius Flamma's ſucceſs againſt the Samnites, 56. Relieves Appius, 57. Ill-hated by him, 58. Defeats the Hetrurians, and Samnites, ibid. Noble behaviour towards Decius, 59. Sent to cover Samnium, 60.

Uſentine tribe, whence ſo called, 29.

Utica taken by the Romans, 124. Evacuated, 129. Beſieged by Scipio, 280. Relinquiſhed, 281. Blockaded, ibid.

Vulſo L. Manlius defeats the Carthaginians at ſea, and makes a deſcent into Africa, 121, 122. Sent into Sicily, 134. Beſieges Lilybeum, 138.

—— Cn. Manlius's ſucceſs againſt the Galatians, 308, & ſeq.

W

WAR, ſocial, the cauſes of 513, 315. Succeſs of it, ibid. & ſeq.

Women, Roman, a number of, turn poiſoners, 5.

—— two die for joy at the unexpected ſight of their ſons, 400.

—— turn gladiatrices, 409.

X

XAntippus made general of the Carthaginians, 126. Regulates the diſcipline of their forces, ibid. Defeats the Romans, 127. Ungratefully uſed by the Carthaginians, 288.

Z

ZAMA, where ſituate, 289. The battle of, 290.

—— beſieged by the Romans, 450.

The End of the Twelfth Volume.

Directions to the Binder for placing the CUTTS.

MAP of Africa Propria, and Numidia, Page 122

--- Africa Proper, ibid.

--- Of the Rout of Hannibal thro' Gaul over the Alps into Italy, Page 196

--- Antient Spain, Page 214

--- Antient Gaul as divided into Narbonenſis, &c. Page 476